Soul Sonnets of A Stenographer

BY S. E. KISER

VI

How kind the Governor was yesterday.
And once I caught him looking down at me —
I know I'm blushing — almost wistfully.
And, turning quickly then, he looked away,
And, leaning on his desk, began to play
A tune by drumming with his fingers. We Were in the office all alone and he,
I'm sure, had something that he wished to say.

Ah, how I felt my cheeks burn as I sat
And ran my fingers up and down the keys
And wondered if my hair strung down behind.
I plainly felt my heart go pitapat.
Till suddenly he gave an awful sneeze
And then reached for a letter which he signed.

VII

How dark and dismal everything appears:
Sometimes I wish I never had been born;
The fragile rose is hardly worth the thorn,
The smiles but half repay us for the tears;
We barter happy days for doleful years;
To-day the joys of yesterday we mourn,
We sigh for loving looks, and words of scorn,
As breakers beat the shore, assail our ears.

He turned to me a little while ago
With anger and impatience in his face:
"You're getting careless with your work," he said:
"I see you spell 'lose' with a double o —
Remember that there's no I in 'embrace'!"
And, oh, the scornful way he jerked his head.

VIII

I hardly slept last night, and in my dreams
A hundred ugly phantoms seemed to rise;
Old, scrawny witches tried to scratch my eyes,
And nightmares came along in double teams;
But, ah, once more the glad sun brightly beams,
And all the clouds have faded from the skies;
Through all my fancies happy visions rise —
I seem to hear the tinkle of glad streams.

He greeted me this morning with a smile,
And asked me if the hours were too long.
And there was something tender in his style,
As if he were acknowledging a wrong.
And in my gladness every little while
I find that I have broken into song.

IX

This morning, as I sat with him alone,
When Teddy Roberts had gone out a while,
He looked up at me with a little smile,
And in his eyes a look of kindness shone:
I let my soul peep coyly from my own,
Then, turning, fumbled with the letter-file,
And stacked my pencils in a little pile,
And heard him say, in such a kindly tone:

"We all make foolish blunders now and then,
And I confess that I have made my share ——"
I fancied it was coming then and there,
But, ah, poor me! What luck I have! Two men
Came in to talk about some deal somewhere,
And hung around and spoiled the whole affair.

X

I think of him as "William," but until he
Is free I'll merely have to think it. Oh,
It seems so long to wait for her to go:
I wonder if I'll ever call him "Billy"?
Of course I'd never think of saying "Willie"
To one as old and gray as he is, though;
I wish that I could find some way to know
If to himself he thinks of me as "Lillie."

I don't expect to ever really love him,
But few get love and money, anyway.
When I am his and he's at work all day,
Down here, I'll see but precious little of him.
So, if December turns out gloomy, May
Can still proceed to blossom and be gay.

LEARN TO WRITE ADVERTISEMENTS

A system representing the highest standard of advertising instruction in the world.

1 M. B. HOLLEY

Every student a star in the advertising world!

1. Page-Davis System is a big help to you in your present position and helps you to better your position.
2. Page-Davis Students know there is no "hurry up plan" nor any "bargains" in education.
3. When you enroll with the Page-Davis Company you are not experimenting or being experimented upon.
4. Page-Davis Graduates are constantly sought for by representative houses throughout the land.
5. Page-Davis School is acknowledged the oldest—biggest—best and safest institution of its kind in the world. They have proven results—their graduates receive the highest salaries.
6. Successful business men say, "I want a Page-Davis man." Successful graduates say, "I am a Page-Davis man."
7. Every Page-Davis Student has the evidence of a thorough and personal attention to their work.
8. The Page-Davis Students must be a credit to the Page-Davis Company. Their individual success is worth more to us than their individual tuition.
9. The Page-Davis Company is an institution that promises less than it gives.
10. When you enroll with the Page-Davis School it is a source of satisfaction to know that you are in good company. Your fellow students are people to whom only successful arguments will appeal. They are your equals, not your inferiors.

1 Evening Record, Traverse City, Mich.

Mr. M. B. Holley, Advertising Manager, Hannah & Lay Mercantile Co., Traverse City, Mich.

My Dear Mr. Holley: Permit me this first day of the new year to congratulate you upon the marked improvement in the advertising of the Hannah & Lay Co., during the past few months. You have made excellent use of the space employed by your house, and I believe your methods must have brought the best possible results. In the matter of display and arrangement you have exercised commendable judgment. It adds materially to the appearance of the Record, which we appreciate greatly.

I believe the class of advertising which you are putting out must bring effective notice to the goods you advertise. I predict that these progressive times will be met by you with suggestions which reflect new and modern ideas and methods of trade drawing. In this connection permit me also to suggest that your employment of the advantages of the Page-Davis School has been of good service to you, and I am sure you appreciate such advantages to their full value. Thanking you for your efforts in this direction, which are of benefit to the newspapers, I beg to wish you a very happy and prosperous New Year.

J. W. HANNEN.

2 The Tribune, Charlotte, Mich.

We wish to express to you our thanks for incidentally assisting us in our business. Before attending your school our young friend, Ernest K. Hellway, was recognized as very clever in his work as an ad-writer. However, we are assured that his abilities have grown remarkably under your instruction. The result with us is seen in better appearance of ads and increased patronage. You are doing a good work. Respectfully,

PERRY & McGRATH, Publishers Tribune, Charlotte, Mich.

3 The Denver Republican, Denver, Colo.

To Whom it May Concern:

It is a matter of great pleasure to recommend very highly the abilities of Mr. Alexander M. Candee as an advertisement writer.

I have had personal acquaintance with Mr. Candee for several years and am familiar with his work in connection with the Daniels & Fisher Stores Co., of this city, and can honestly state that I consider his work first-class in every particular. Anyone wishing to employ him as an advertisement designer and writer will make no mistake, I feel assured. Yours truly,

F. I. CARRUTHERS, Advertising Manager.

4 Kewanee Ptg. and Pub. Co., Kewanee, Ill.

Mr. Lester Taylor,

Dear Sir: We have been watching pretty carefully the advertising you have been writing since you have had charge of the advertising in the big department store of Lay & Layman. We think you have set the pace for all the advertising in the city, as your ads have been uniformly the best and most attractive of any in our paper.

KEWANEE PTG. & PBG. CO., Will Curtis, Manager.

5 The Fostoria Times, Fostoria, Ohio

Gentlemen: Please allow me to say a few words for E. F. Marcha, of this place, who has taken your course of instruction in ad-writing. I can plainly see that Mr. Marcha has made a wonderful improvement in ad-writing and ad-soliciting. In fact, he has worked up our merchants to such an extent that we are more than pleased with the increase in advertising. Your school is certainly a great benefit to our country, and I assure you that you have my hearty co-operation in your good work.

Sincerely yours, ROBERT C. MILLER, Business Manager.

6 The Chronicle Co., Marion, Ind.

Mr. David Crichton, Marion, Ind.

Dear Sir: We wish to take this opportunity of complimenting you on the appearance of your advertising for Messrs. Goldthaite & Son. Since you have been in charge of the advertising department of their large department store the advertising has steadily improved, and, we think, must have proved many times more profitable to them than their former work in that line. It is with much pleasure that we note the tendency of Marion merchants to employ expert managers of their advertising departments, because we know that careful and competent handling of their advertising space will most surely bring many times the returns that poor ads bring, and this will naturally cause them to use more and larger space, which, you see, results directly to our profit. An advertisement made by an expert, correctly balanced and changed very often, is bright and fresh, and to a certain large class of our readers, it is as good in our columns as local news.

We are very much pleased with the improvement in Messrs. Goldthaite & Son's advertising, and the amount of space they are now using would indicate that they also are more than satisfied with the results.

We are, yours truly,

THE CHRONICLE CO., C. W. Crane, Secy.

7 The Times, Kankakee, Ill.

Mr. J. C. Greenwood, who is a graduate of the Page-Davis School of Advertising, is thoroughly conversant with every detail of ad-writing. His is the only professional copy received at this office—the printers being enabled to follow it to the letter. Judging by the big crowds nearly always present at Lecour's Department Store, for which Mr. Greenwood does the advertising, it certainly pays to employ a good ad-writer.

DUNLAP & LIVINGSTON, Publishers.

8 Daily and Weekly Sentinel, Centralia, Ill.

Mr. D. A. Ryan, Centralia, Ill.

Dear Sir: We are glad to give you our views on the improvement of your ad-writing, for it certainly has been considerable since your term of instruction in the Page-Davis School.

It is a pleasure to run advertising in which there is originality and interest, and it is an actual benefit to the paper running it. Your instruction certainly must have been thorough, from the carefulness with which you prepare your matter, and insist on exact following of display.

THOS. L. JOY & CO., Publishers.

9 The Worcester Spy, Worcester, Mass.

Mr. George H. Hayward, Worcester, Mass.

Dear Sir: It gives me great pleasure to commend your work to the attention of advertisers. Wherever you have had an opportunity to show your ability in writing advertising we have found it to the advantage of the advertiser as well as to us.

Your practical knowledge of the details of the printing business and attention to the art of publicity make an excellent combination. As you can testify, I have tried to give you every facility possible to increase your business since you have opened your Worcester office. Yours truly, CHARLES NUTT, Publisher.

10 The News, Slatington, Pa.

Page-Davis Co., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen: Replying to yours of recent date, we must say that we are well pleased with the ad-work of Mr. R. J. Kitchline, of this place, who, we understand, is one of your graduates. While we did not have so much of his ad-writing for "The News" still what we had could always be told by the bold display and plenty of white space, which made the particular ad stand out from the others. As to job work, we had quite a lot of circulars, cards, folders, etc.

Literary Folk Their Ways & Their Work

THE BOOKSELLERS AND BOOKMAKERS —A coöperative association which in some quarters has been greeted with a faint squeak of "Trust"!

¶ When at the request of many booksellers the leading publishers of the United States formed an association for the purpose of ending the ruinous price-cutting that was raging between department stores and regular booksellers, there came a faint squeak of "Trust" from some quarters. Wise heads wagged and booksellers who were reluctant to admit that publishers could be capable of disinterestedness sagely prophesied that the final stage in the evolution of the American Publishers' Association would be the formation of a gigantic trust, under whose auspices eventually all books would be issued. But with the raw material in the form of gray matter, and the laws which govern its output no more exact than those which control the vagaries of authorship, the formation of a successful trust built up on such an uncertain foundation is beyond the reach of credulity.

Now comes another combination of interests for purposes of economy. Some two hundred retail booksellers in as many cities and towns of the United States have united to form a corporation under the name of The Consolidated Retail Booksellers. The corporation is organized for the purpose of buying books in large quantities at the lowest prices. The price of books, like other commodities, depends upon the quantity purchased. Many a small bookseller is unable on account of his limited capital, or unwilling on account of the risk, to purchase in quantity sufficient to obtain the lowest price. His competitor is, and as the bookseller must meet his neighbor's prices his profit is less. In some cities it has been the custom for several booksellers to combine and order the full quantity, each taking his pro-rata share; the foundation of The Consolidated Retail Booksellers is the natural evolution of this plan. Each member will be assessed an amount necessary to conduct the business of the corporation. In return he will pay less money for his goods and realize the benefits of economy in packing and shipping. It is but another step in the direction of combination, and is a fairly good example of the natural progress of economic development.

HUMOR MUST HAVE A DEFINITE PURPOSE—George Ade's missionary work among benighted playgoers.

¶ The success of The Sultan of Sulu and Peggy from Paris, which serves to introduce the witty satirist, Mr. George Ade, to the public as a comic opera librettist, is certain to be a matter of gratification to the long-suffering playgoers whose endurance has been tested by the maudlin efforts of writers who thought that a farcical piece was all the better for not having either plot or purpose. Mr. Ade succeeds where so many others have failed, not because of the wit of his lines or the jingle of his lyrics, but because, like a true satirist, he aimed his bolts of humor at a definite, well-defined topic instead of firing in the air. The absurdity of certain existing conditions in our new Eastern possessions appealed strongly to his sense of humor and he straightway satirized the situation as he saw it, and so forcibly that now the playgoing public sees it in his way, too.

Of late years our librettists have cherished the delusion that a comic opera consisted of nothing but a grand march, some topical verses, a waltz duet, three or four changes of costume for the chorus and half a dozen variety specialties. This delusion has cost many librettists their reputation and many managers their money. Mr. Ade, who is likely to gain reputation in his new field of endeavor, has profited by the example of some of his successful predecessors, who, it will be observed, never sat down to write the book of a comic opera without having some distinct purpose in mind.

For example: in La Grande Duchesse, the first of the Second Empire school of opera bouffe, we find the court and army of a tiny German principality held up to the ridicule of a nation drunk with the sense of its own power and the splendors of an imperial court builded on sand. In La Belle Hélène, the most sacred fables of a mythology that was a religion to the ancients are dragged down to the level of the boulevard, there to be greeted with the irreverent laughter of those who believe in nothing.

In the Gilbert and Sullivan operas we find the same fixed purpose. Pinafore ridicules the navy and Patience the æsthetes. Gilbert always aimed at some legitimate subject for ridicule and generally hit his target.

To come down to more recent times, we find the most noteworthy example in the case of the late Charles W. Hoyt, who never took up his pen except for the purpose of impaling some particular passing folly. In A Tin Soldier he satirized the plumbers, in A Milk-White Flag the militia, in A Bunch of Keys the hotel business, in A Stranger in New York the French ball, in A Contented Woman the woman in politics, while in A Midnight Bell the New England deacon was drawn for the first time precisely as he is. It was only when he departed from his policy, or became too serious, as he did in A Temperance Town, that he failed.

Mr. Ade's success proves that there is still a greater demand for satire in dramatic form than for the hotchpotch of sextettes and coon songs that usually does duty as a musical comedy, and which can be arranged by a blacksmith or a dancing-master as well as by a man of wit.

MR. KIPLING'S CHINESE SUNRISE—And his exclusive reference to the Isle of Man—Perhaps a cabal against Hall Caine?

¶ Mr. Kipling is a careful, painstaking workman; he revises his copy and his proofs repeatedly and in minute detail. Technicalities are his diet and omniscience his ambition, but with every care he cannot escape a share of human frailty, and there are errors standing in his pages to-day which could not fail to be hunted out by his many attentive readers.

Some curiosity has been felt over the epithet "shameless Hun" as applied to the German in Mr. Kipling's recently published poem of protest against the alliance with Germany; and no good explanation seems to be forthcoming. Then arises a Mr. Callins who writes to the editor of a New York newspaper anent a line from The Rhyme of the Three Sealers:

> There's never a law of God or man runs North of Fifty-Three.

A statement, Mr. Callins proceeds to point out, which if followed around the globe would cut out all Scotland, about half of England and Ireland—yes, and the Isle of Man!

Can it be that Mr. Kipling had designs on Hall Caine?

But when Mr. Callins breaks in on our favorite Mandalay, Mandalay that we used to sing on summer nights to our best and dearest; when he gets out his atlas and his compasses and proves that China is about two hundred miles northeast of Mandalay and the bay about twice as far to the south and westward, and that therefore dawn could "come up like thunder" if it wanted to, but never "outer China crost the bay"; when he thus assails us in our tenderest recollections we cannot arise and call him blessed. Does he not know that they do everything back-handed in China—and why not sunrises? Anyway, poetry is better than geography, and will still be loved and remembered when all the geographies have been burned and all the faultfinders buried.

We control the two largest circulating libraries in the world. The Booklovers and the Tabard Inn are known throughout the United States, Canada and Great Britain. These two libraries circulate more than twelve million books annually. We have just organized a new library known as which fits in very nicely with our book-lending enterprises. Our other libraries are retail; this new library is wholesale. If you want to start a circulating library in your village or town we will rent you a Bodley Club Library at a very small rental; from One Dollar a week up according to the size of the library and the character of books wanted. You can make your own charges for membership fees or for exchanges. We supply circulars, membership forms, exchange tickets, advertisements for local papers, letter paper; everything necessary for carrying on the work. We really start you in business and help you to carry it on. If your location is a good one you can easily add from $250 to $500 a year to your income. The first application received from a village or town will be considered first. These libraries are rented also to book and literary clubs, to schools and colleges, to institutions and churches, to office buildings and to summer hotels. The books are put up in attractive cases, in two shades of blue—the Oxford colors. We change the books regularly, giving you a fresh supply each month. Orders from any town or city in the United States will have immediate attention. Full particulars, blank forms of application, and descriptive circulars mailed upon application. For one dollar a sample book will be sent with the circulars. Address

COLLEGE PROFESSORS

Talk of Foods

The New York papers recently contained a long account of the so-called discovery of a celebrated professor in one of the leading universities. The "discovery" related to a new and successful way of treating wheat and barley to prepare the starchy part by dry baking, so it would be made more digestible and nutritious. Thereupon Prof. Livingstone, commenting on the discovery of the other Professor, says, "A discoverer who was a business man first and a scientist afterward found that such foods could be made more digestible when cooked with dry heat instead of by boiling in water, and has already placed on the market the food which he discovered prior to Dr. ——." This refers to Grape-Nuts, the most scientifically made food known. Grape-Nuts can be easily digested by babies or any one with a weak stomach and the food contains the most powerful rebuilding element known, particularly as relates to the rebuilding of the brain and nerve centres. It is a delicious food, requiring no cooking but ready for instant service just as it comes from the package. A recipe book free in each package describes many delicious dishes made from Grape-Nuts.

A Vatican Episode

F. MONTAGUE HANDLEY, the American sculptor, tells of an episode which he witnessed at the Vatican that is not without interest.

A young New Yorker wintering in Rome had joined the Circolo di San Pietro, a club to which most of the young Roman noblemen belong and whose object is charity. Shortly after his admission he was notified that an audience was to be given by the Pope to several hundred people on a certain date, and that his name had been placed on the list of club members who would help to receive. Full dress is always worn at these audiences and the club members wear a badge to distinguish them from the guests. Our young friend being somewhat of a dandy added a few sprays of lilies of the valley to his costume. Now, it is a strict rule of the Vatican that no flowers shall be worn, but of course no one thought of a "Circolo" man ignoring the fact and nothing was said to him.

As Leo XIII appeared, carried in his big gilded chair, the receiving men walked up, as is their wont, to kiss his hand. When the New Yorker approached, the Pope looked admiringly at this fair, stalwart youth, so unlike his young Romans, and then, noting the forbidden flowers, smiled gently.

"We do not wear flowers in the Vatican, my son," he said, taking the offending blossoms as if to cast them away, but he hesitated, smelled their fragrant petals, and then, suddenly changing his mind, he returned them to the owner.

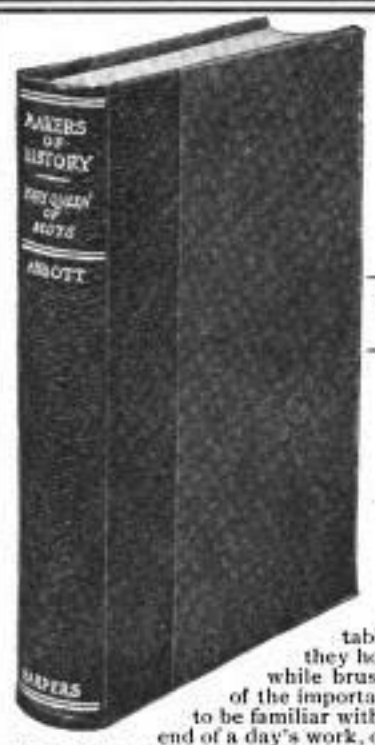
"Keep them," he almost whispered, "and may your life be as spotless as they now are."

The Long and the Short of It

THE Hon. Herbert W. Bowen, United States Minister to Venezuela, is just now standing in the centre of the public limelight because of his notable part in the Venezuelan tangle. It is evident that President Castro thinks highly of the services he has rendered.

When Mr. Bowen first went out to Caracas as the United States Minister, President Castro called on him one afternoon. The two went into the garden and Mr. Bowen was expressing his amazement at the rapidity of all vegetable growth in that climate. "A seed planted overnight would result in forty trees the next day," was his laughing remark. Just then an American photographer passed, and asked to take a picture of the two distinguished men as they stood among the flowers. As he snapped the camera he made some laughing, disparaging remark about the picture being the long and the short of it. Mr. Bowen is six feet four inches, and President Castro reaches about to his shoulder. The President did not like the unkindly comparison, and looked up quickly at the new American Minister with a frown.

"Ah, Mr. President," said Mr. Bowen, "I was very small when I got here, but I shot up overnight in this marvelous climate of yours."



A Cool Monarch

KING VICTOR EMANUEL III of Italy, in spite of his diminutive stature, which often makes him the butt of his enemies' jests, is known for a man of dauntless courage and iron nerves.

A few years ago while holding the rank of colonel in a regiment of artillery he was intrusted with the testing of a new cannon that the army was then experimenting with. He proceeded to the trial field accompanied by several officers of rank and the inventor, and after a short explanation of the relative points of the gun, order was given to aim it at the target.

At the first shot the huge engine of destruction exploded near the breech with a terrible crash, and the panic-stricken men fled precipitately. Not so Victor Emanuel, who did not stir an inch, but, turning with an amused smile to the frightened officers, reassured them chaffingly:

"No danger now, gentlemen," he said calmly; "you should have fled before the explosion."

What Abraham Lincoln said of the "Makers of History"

"To these books I am indebted for about all the historical knowledge I possess. I have not education enough to appreciate the profound works of voluminous historians, and, if I had, I have no time to read them. But these books give me, in brief compass, just that knowledge of past men and events that I need. I have read them with the greatest interest."

And You?

If you are just a little rusty on the Makers of the World's History, the men and women who have made and left their mark, now is your opportunity. To the busy man or woman, who has little time and no inclination to study History, these 32 delightful volumes come as a veritable gold mine, for they amuse while they instruct, they hold your attention like the most absorbing novel, while brushing away the cobwebs which obscure your view of the important events in the World's History, things you ought to be familiar with. These are books you will read and enjoy at the end of a day's work, or between times. Not the kind you put on a shelf to look at, hoping to read some day for improvement without much pleasure.

That is why for over 40 years Abbott's Biographies have been a household word from Maine to California. Why over 200,000 people in this country treasure them in their homes. Why Boards of Education in many States have adopted them as an authority. Read what Abraham Lincoln says of them

"Oh, no. That is to say, there always has been a slight tension, and it doesn't grow better. I've made a little money — real estate has risen, you know, and that sort of thing — and I've been working hard, so I intend to resign. I take it, you have some scheme to propose to Mr. Rockervelt?"

"Yes, I have."

"Very well. Your scheme, if it is a good one, will prove your best introduction. He's an accessible man, but plunge right to the point when you meet him. He likes directness. And, by the way, he will be here Wednesday morning. The big conference of railway presidents begins on Thursday afternoon at Portandit, and he will be there, of course. We attach his private car to Number Three Wednesday night, and your best time to see him might be in his car during the four miles he's running to the Junction. The Express waits for him at the Junction. You haven't much time, but it will prove all the time he'll want to allow you if your project doesn't appeal to him."

"Say," cried Callahan, a-thrill with the portent of a sudden idea, "couldn't you persuade Rockervelt to hitch his car to the Burdock Thunderbolt? I'll run him through to Portandit and save him that dreary daylight trip from Tobasco."

Manson shook his head.

"Mr. Rockervelt would go over no other road than his own. I could not propose such a thing, and Mr. Blair would not."

Callahan drew a deep breath.

"Jimmy," said Manson gravely, "you should pay more attention to your personal appearance than you do. Your collar's unbuttoned." Callahan groped wildly round his ear for the missing end, but his mind was on something else. Manson reached for it and buttoned it. Then the two men parted.

Callahan walked down to the Grand Union Station deep in thought. He had determined to take Rockervelt's private car from its place with one of his own pony engines and attach it to his own express, and he was formulating his plans. Once away from the Junction, the Government itself could not stop him. And now we need a railway map to explain the situation. (See Page 3.)

From Warmington to Portandit or to Tobasco was a long night's ride. The Thunderbolt left the Junction on the Burdock at 8 P. M. The Pacific Express on the Midland left at 8:20 — one train from the south side of the station, the other from the north.

At ten minutes to eight John Manson received a telephone message asking him to remain within call. A short time after, when the men were coupling the private car to the westbound train, Callahan rushed in to the telephone cabin and shouted: "That you, Mr. Manson?"

"Yes; who are you?"

"Callahan. Say, I've just coupled Mr. Rockervelt's car to the Thunderbolt. Release Number Three, for she will wait in vain. Telegraph all those people that Rockervelt was to meet at Tobasco to-morrow morning to take the midnight train for Portandit and meet him there."

"Callahan, are you out of your senses?"

"No. It's all as I say. Nothing can stop us."

"I haven't the list of the men that——"

"Then call up Blair. He's on Number Three. You must get the list."

"Callahan, stop before it is too late. This is kidnaping — brigands' work. You are breaking laws that will——"

"I know, I know. Good-night."

Callahan rushed out to the platform, nodded to the conductor, swung himself on the Pullman car, the conductor swung his lantern and the Thunderbolt swung out into the night.

When the deft and silent negro had cleared away the breakfast dishes the next morning and removed the tablecloth, Mr. Rockervelt leaned back in his chair and lit a cigar. There was much to think of, and he was thinking much. The car rolled along with gratifying smoothness and the great man paid no attention to the scenery, otherwise he might have been startled, for he knew well the environment of his own line. As for the negro, all roads were alike to him, as was the case with the coon in the song, and he attended solely and silently to his master's comfort. He hovered about for a few moments, then said deferentially:

"Day's a gennelman, sah, in de sleepah ahead's been asking for you, sah, two or three

If you were to buy it one piece at a time it would cost you over $200.00.

A Bookcase Free if You Order at Once.

The World's Best Music

This is the most comprehensive collection of music in existence. It contains 2,200 pages of sheet music — which is 500 more than any other Musical Library. It is fully indexed, so that any selection can be quickly found. The volumes are specially bound so that they open flat on the piano. All the world-famous composers are represented — including such names as Wagner, Liszt, Paderewski, Sullivan, Mozart, Handel, Chopin, De Koven, Strauss and Gounod — but the selections have been so carefully made that none is too difficult for the average performer. The work contains 300 instrumental selections by the best composers, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. There are 350 best old and new songs, duets, trios and quartets. Among the selections are 100 new and copyrighted pieces of music by American composers. As a musical cyclopedia it is unexcelled, for it contains 500 biographies of musicians and 400 portraits, many of the last being attractive chromatic plates in six to ten colors. The volumes are handsomely bound in art cloth and half-leather. In number of pages of sheet music, number of biographies, and in number of illustrations, this Musical Library leads all others.

Size of Volumes, 9 x 12 Inches.

$1.00 a Month Payments

Through our Musical Library Club, while the remaining sets last, the prices of this splendid collection of music will be $21.00 for a set in cloth binding and $25.00 for half-leather binding — payable $1.00 a month. The value of this bargain can be shown by the fact that thousands of these sets have previously been sold for $35.00 and $40.00. We have only a few hundred sets on hand, which will be sold at the low Club price to those who order promptly. This is your last opportunity to secure this magnificent work at a low price and on easy payments. Cut out the coupon and send it to us today. We will send you a set, express prepaid, for five days' examination. If you are not satisfied, return the books to us at our expense. But if you decide to keep the set, send us $1.00 at the expiration of five days and $1.00 a month thereafter until the full amount is paid.

BOOK-CASE FREE

We have a small number of elegant oak-wood book-cases that are made especially to hold a set of the "World's Best Music." Their retail price is $4.00 each, but we have decided to offer them as premiums to prompt subscribers. To obtain a book-case free with your set, it will be necessary to send us your order before April 20th. If your order is received after that date, we cannot supply a book-case with the set, unless, of course, you care to pay the retail price of $4.00 for the case. This book-case is a present from us, and does not increase the cost of the music in any manner.

HOW SHALL A YOUNG MAN SUCCEED?

The most helpful thing is a good working knowledge of the great science and art of advertising. It will make him keener, brighter — more efficient all the rest of his life. He can turn his knowledge into money. Many "ad-writers" earn $20 to $100 a week, and more. And few employees have so good a chance for advancement. The position is pleasant, lucrative and dignified. My method of instruction is so simple and complete, that any man, or woman, with a good command of the English language can, in three months, acquire sufficient knowledge to begin to earn money, though I keep in touch with my students, and help them, and advise them for a whole year. To those who are interested enough to forward 6 cents to cover mailing, I will send, free, booklets and other matter, including, among other things, "How Shall a Young Man Succeed?" "The Ill-Fortune of Brother Bill," "Other People's Brains," "Who Should Study Advertising," "Why Advertising Should be Studied," "Why and How Advertising can be Taught."

times dis mawning, sah. He'd like to have some conversation with you, sah, if you's disengaged."

"Who is he?"

"Here's he's cawd, sah."

Mr. Rockervelt glanced at the card and murmured, "'James Callahan, General Manager Burdock Route.' That's strange." Then aloud: "Show Mr. Callahan in, Peter."

The magnate did not rise as the red-head bowed to him, but waved his hand toward a chair.

"I hope you have slept well, Mr. Rockervelt," began the newcomer.

"Excellently."

"And I trust you found the roadbed in good order."

Mr. Rockervelt raised his eyebrows with some surprise.

"My own bed and the roadbed left nothing to be desired, since you are so kind as to ask."

"I am delighted to hear you say so, sir," cried Jimmy with enthusiasm.

"Why should you be delighted to hear me praise my own road?" asked Rockervelt curiously.

"Well, sir, to tell you the truth, I wished a few minutes' talk with you, and that's not as easy come at as you might think. You are not on your own road, but on the Burdock Route, now rapidly approaching Portandit. I took the liberty last night of hitching your car to this train, sir, instead of to your own Number Three."

Rockervelt sat up in alarm, glanced out of the windows, first on one side then on the other. Bringing back his gaze to the man before him, hot anger adding color to the usual floridness of his countenance, he said:

"You took the liberty, did you? Well, let me tell you, sir, it is a liberty you will bitterly regret."

"I am sorry to hear you say that, sir."

"The liberty! Curse it, sir! you have disarranged all my plans. There are three men in Tobasco whom it is imperative I should meet this forenoon before the convention opens."

"Quite so, sir. I had them telegraphed to take the midnight and meet you at Portandit instead. They'll be waiting for you when you get in, sir."

"The d—l you did!" gasped Rockervelt, sinking back in his chair.

"You see, sir, it's an uneasy conference you would have had on that rocky road to Dublin, the T. & P. A long forenoon's ride, sir, with a road as rough as a rail fence. It would be like coming down the Soo Rapids, only you wouldn't go so quick. I have a carriage waiting for you. You can drive to your hotel at your ease, hold your conference in your room, and drop in to the convention whenever it pleases you, sir."

"Have you also arranged my return to New York, Mr. Callahan? By what route do you intend to send me back?"

Jimmy laughed that cheerful, infectious laugh of his. He realized that the danger point was passed.

"I hope you will get safe back to New York, whatever route you take, sir."

"Thank you. How long have you been General Manager of this road?"

"About two years, sir."

"Where did you learn the business?"

"In the greatest railroad school of this world, sir—the Rockervelt system."

The faint shadow of a smile passed over the face of Mr. Rockervelt.

"That I take as a handsome return for my testimonial to your roadbed. Why did you leave us?"

"I failed to please Mr. Blair, sir."

"In whose department were you?"

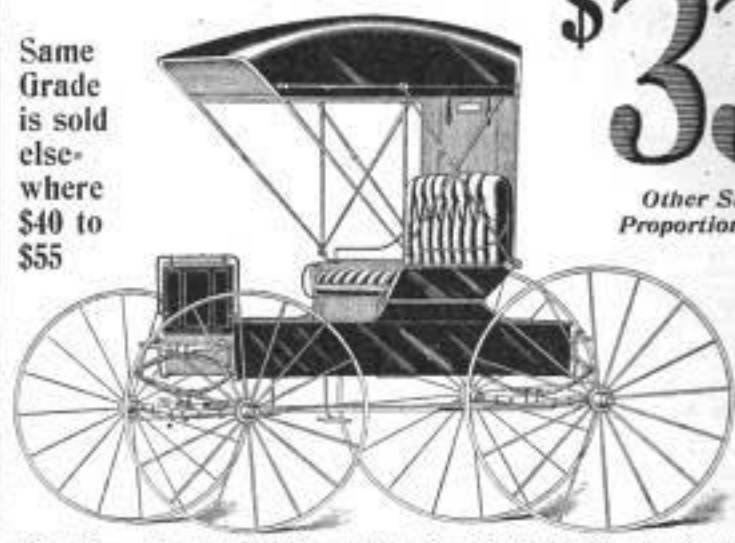
"In the Division Superintendent's."

"Did you please John Manson?"

"I think I did, sir."

"Um. Well, now, you did not kidnap me for the purposes of pleasant conversation. I don't like to see good men leave us, and if your object in kidnaping me was to come back to us, I may at once admit I am willing to entertain a proposal."

"No, sir. That was not my object, although I make bold to say that an offer from Mr. Rockervelt would exact respect from the greatest in the land, and I'm no exception to my betters. What I wanted, sir, was for you to cast your eye over this map. The red line represents sixty-three miles."



"I see; if a railway were built along that red line your road would have access to New York independent of me. Well, young man, don't let that red line worry you. I could not allow you to get a charter."

"I'm not so sure of that, sir. Like the other fellow's fifteen dollars, I've got the charter in my inside pocket."

"Do you mind showing it to me?" asked Rockervelt, unconsciously finishing the line of the song referred to. Jimmy handed him the documents, and the great man scrutinized them with the quick care of an expert, while Jimmy stood expectant.

"How did you overcome Blair's opposition?" he inquired at last.

"There was no opposition."

The President's brow frowned and a glint of anger appeared in the cold, calculating eyes.

"I expect Blair to watch the legislature as well as the railway."

"He watches neither, sir."

Rockervelt glanced sharply at the young man who thus dared to asperse one of the minor gods of the Rockervelt System.

"Then who looks after the Midland?"

"John Manson, and he does it well."

"Where did you get the money to put this through? A syndicate?"

"No. I didn't need any money. All I needed was that one of your General Managers should be sound asleep."

"I see you are prejudiced against Mr. Blair."

"I am, sir."

Rockervelt pulled himself together as one who has had enough of badinage and now prepares for business.

"Now, young man," he began in a voice that cut like a knife, "do you know the value of these documents?"

"Yes, sir. They're not worth a d—n!"

"What!" cried Rockervelt, suddenly sitting straight. "I thought you had kidnaped me to hold me up in Western fashion. Don't you want to sell this charter?"

"No, sir. I offered the charter to the President of the Burdock, as was my duty, but he said you would beat any combination that might be formed in the long run."

"Yes, or in the short run. Sensible man, Rogers. Well, sir, you do not expect an exorbitant price for a worthless charter?"

"I want no price at all. The charter is yours. But I'd like to offer a bit of advice as well as the charter. Make John Manson Manager of the Midland."

"I resolved to do that ten minutes ago. Now, what for yourself?"

"Only bear me in mind when you have a place for a red-headed man down East."

"Perhaps you expect Manson's vacant post on the Midland?" suggested Rockervelt.

"I've no doubt he'd give it to me," replied Jimmy frankly, "but if you mean that Mr. Manson and I have made a deal, we're neither of us that kind of person. Manson knows nothing of this, and is a very anxious man since I telephoned from the Junction last night that I hooked your car to my train. He was warning me against the penalties as I rung him off."

"I believe you. Now I want a special over your road to bring Manson to Portandit at once."

"Certainly, sir."

"You make arrangements and I'll telegraph to him as soon as we arrive. I'll give you eight thousand dollars a year, to begin on, if you'll come to New York."

"I'll take it, sir."

"You don't ask your duties. Are you so confident you can fulfill them?"

"If they pertain to railroading I'll guarantee to do them a little better than any one else."

"That's the kind of man I want."

John Manson had not much to say for himself when, with Jimmy Callahan, he stood before Rockervelt next day, but it was easy to see that the belated recognition and promotion which had come so unexpectedly had made a new man of him.

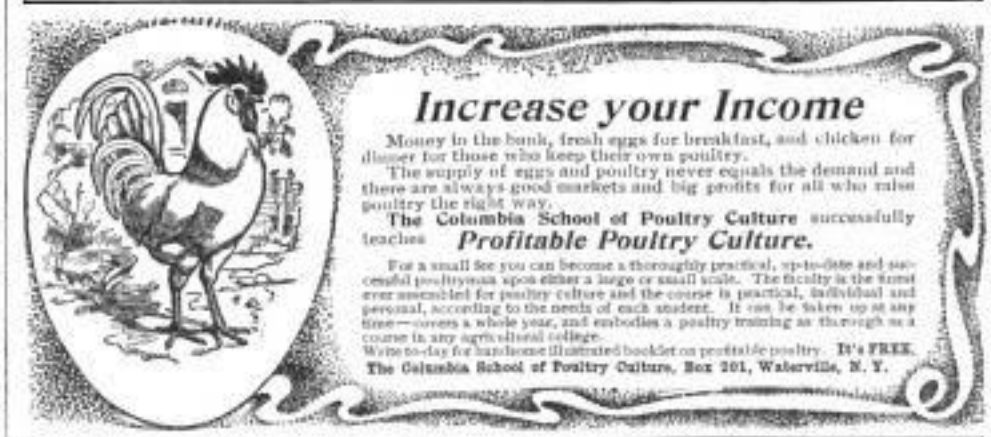
As he and Jimmy went from the presence together and reached the street Manson said:

"Now, Callahan, I want you to leave the Burdock and take the vacant Division Superintendency."

Jimmy laughed joyously as he realized his friend had no notion of what had happened. Manson looked gravely at him and continued:

"It is worth ——" He paused and a scarcely perceptible shade of loving annoyance passed over his face.

"Callahan," he said slowly, "your necktie has slipped round under your right ear. When you meet men like Mr. Rockervelt you cannot be too careful of your personal appearance. Let me put it straight for you."



Callahan raised his chin and laughed again while Manson tugged at the tie.

"You may laugh, Jimmy, but these little things are sometimes important, and I want to see you succeed as you deserve. There, that's better."

And Jimmy said no word of his eight thousand a year to begin on.

The Autobiography of a Beggar

De cop grabs Crutch by de arm, lettin' meh go, an' he says, "Yer de one what kidnaped de Chinee kid, eh?"

"Not meh," says Crutch. "I runned ater him ter bring him back. Axe de kid hisself ef yer don't berlieve meh."

"I'm goin' ter run yer in," says de cop, "fer——"

"I don't care fer what yer runs meh in," says Crutch, "only run meh out ef de way ef dese Chineses, fer dey pinches most awful. I heard oncet ez Chineses has finger-nails like——"

"I don't care what yer heard," says de cop; "keep still."

An' while de cop an' Crutch was a-havin' de arginint about de finger-nails ef Chineses, I leans down an' whispers ter de poor little Chinee kid fer which I feels sorry:

"Kid, de door is open; git ready fer ter run;" an' I up an' yanks de pigtail ef de Chinee what had de kid by de arm, an' he yells an' lets de kid go, thinkin' ez it was him dat done de pullin', an' de kid he flies down de stairs like a yaller streak, an' I stands in de doorway so ez de Chineses can't git by an' I yells:

"Mr. Cop, see fer yersilf ef a Chinee don't turn green when his pigtail is pulled."

An' de cop he laffs fust an' den he makes a grab fer meh aterwards, but de Chineses blocks de way, pushin' an' shovin' atween him an' meh, a-tryin' ter git out ater de Chinee kid.

An' Crutch he seed his chancet an' he makes a break fer de dear old fire-escape oncet more, an' de cop runs fer him, an' I kited down de stairs ater de kid wid all dem Chineses runnin' ater meh ez ef de Chinee wind what blows at night was a-carryin' 'em along. An' I didn't even stop ter blow meh nose; I'm a-tellin' youse I jist did plain runnin' an' nothin' more. An' de best Chinee runner was no more'n a foot behint meh, an' de other Chineses only a foot behint him, an' so on down to de one what was de poorest runner in de lot. It must 'a' looked like a Chinee pigtail behint meh, but I didn't turn aroun' ter see.

An' de prize Chinee runner was a-gittin' so near meh I could feel his yaller breath on meh back, an' I was a-sayin' ter mehself, "Good-night an' good-by!" when I seed a hall door ef a buildin' open, an' I ducked an' turned in lickety-split an' slammed de door an' turned de key, an' den I tore up de stairs to de second floor, an' dere was a winder open an' I jumped thru it on ter a shed berlow an' from dere on ter de ground. An' when I gits down inter de yard I'll be blowed ef I didn't see de little Chinee kid a-sittin' on a old broken chair an' smokin' a cigarette!

"How come yer here?" I hollered.

"Over de alley fence," he says.

"An' I come thru de winder," I says.

"De fence is easier," he says, puffin' his cigarette.

"I didn't have no time ter choose," I says. "An' yer must have a lot ef time ter spare sittin' dere so easy an' smokin'. Dem Chineses'll be here in a minute."

"Which way?" he axes, standin' up an' throwin' de cigarette down. I picks it up an' takes a smoke mehself an' answers:

"Same way ez I come—thru de winder. Look! dere's one ef 'em a-peekin' down now!"

An' I lifted de kid over de fence an' we jumps inter de alley, him runnin' one way an' meh anudder, an' both ef us gittin' away; which was de last time ever I seen dat Chinee kid in meh life. Only poor Crutch he got nabbed by de cop an' sent over fer a month.

I feels sorry fer Crutch, but he had de right ter pull de fat Chinese's pigtail like I tole him, an' not ter dispute meh word 'bout de Chineses an' deir ways, meh havin' read de hist'ry books.

Say, Mr. Anterpolergist, melt autobiographee is close on ter de grave now, an' I wants de twenty-five dollars yer promised meh afore I writes down de account ef meh funerul, else yer will say I'm dead an' yer can't give a dead man no money. Please don't come no science ef man games on meh, an' don't do no anterpolergizin', but hand over de coin in smilin' dimes an' laffin' nickels. How about buyin' back de little Hebrew book on Moses, which I finds has de science ef wimens in it, too?

TRIAL LESSON IN Physical Culture

PHYSICAL CULTURE, as taught by us, means, first of all, the development of Splendid Vitality, Superb Energies, Strong Internal Organs, Stomach, Heart, Lungs, Etc.

All this indicates masterful, manly power and womanly beauty, and can be acquired by the proper culture of physical forces. Every human being can be vastly benefited by building strength in the internal vital organs. Strong arms are always useful, but every one is daily, even hourly, in need of strength of the digestive, respiratory and other vital centers. By our method you are taught how to strengthen the great vital organs. It will help keep you free from disease, and relieve you if already ailing. The weakest invalid, the aged, the middle-aged, the young, and even the strongest athlete can be benefited by increased internal vigor.

Showing the Physical Condition of Bernarr Macfadden, the Editor-in-Chief of four Monthly Magazines and one Weekly for 1903 is presenting a year's course in body-building that can be practiced at home without apparatus or expense. This course represents the life work of Bernarr Macfadden, Editor of PHYSICAL CULTURE and other Magazines, and author of numerous books. The lessons are simple, yet the most elaborate ever published.

AGENTS WANTED
LIBERAL TERMS

THE PHYSICAL CULTURE MAGAZINE

The preparation of the matter and the illustrations of this course have cost Nearly $2,000

It will contain over a hundred photographic illustrations posed by the Author, showing in detail in the plainest manner possible how every internal and external part of the body can be strengthened and developed. One trial lesson of this course and 128-page PHYSICAL CULTURE MAGAZINE, filled with beautiful illustrations, will cost you but 10 cents, stamps or coin. PHYSICAL CULTURE MAGAZINE for the year will contain nearly 1,200 pages of reading matter and about 1,000 Illustrations.

A $1,000 PRIZE is offered to the most perfectly developed man; $1,000 PRIZE to the most beautifully and perfectly developed woman.

If you send $1.00 it will pay for a year's subscription to Physical Culture containing the entire course. Satisfaction Guaranteed. Money refunded without question if not satisfied after receiving first lesson. Better send the dollar, but if you want a trial lesson first, send 10 cents at once. If you send one dollar state if you desire the course from the beginning.

Your Complexion

At the end of a week compare the two sides. If the side on which you used BORAX is not clearer and fresher looking our argument is ended. Results will speak for themselves.

Borax clears the complexion by softening the water so that soap is made much more soluble in it and is thoroughly rinsed out of the pores. Soap is not thoroughly rinsed out unless Borax is added to the water.

First—Add a quarter teaspoonful of Borax to a basin of warm water. Wash your face in this water with soap and a wash rag and rinse it thoroughly in the same water.

Second—Rinse your face in clear water.

Every good thing can be overdone. Remember that a quarter teaspoonful of Borax to a basin of water is sufficient.

There are dangerous adulterations of Borax sold. Pure Borax is sold in packages under the name

AMERICANS OF TODAY & TOMORROW

By Albert J. Beveridge

THE American of to-day is, first of all, the possessor of strength—fortune in location, opulence in resources. He has an advantage in all the natural elements which makes men of other lands almost beggars in comparison. He is a very lord of power. But it is a strange fact that the possessor of great power usually uses it riotously. Youth throws away life as though youth were a millionaire of vitality. Perhaps this is the working out of some deep law of equilibrium, which, after all, will not have strength become too strong. That we Americans have been using the great bank account which Nature put to our credit with the recklessness of a spendthrift the deep criticism of the young German in the last paper demonstrates; and the observation of all thoughtful people confirms it. And so it is that, as pointed out, Germany with puny resources is able to compete with us on the high seas and in the markets of the world. She does this by organization—by the careful conservation of what she has. In the last few weeks the papers have been filled with dispatches reciting afresh what careful students have known for the last five years, that we are in actual danger from German rivalry. It is a very poor thing to get angry with Germany on that account; rather, we should respect her. Respect her and also learn a lesson from her—a lesson which England would have done well to learn when Mr. Williams, many years ago, brought out his remarkable book, Made in Germany. And that lesson is the combined lesson of conservatism of our resources and organization of our energies. Henceforth this must be the dominant note in American national policy and in the personal conduct of each American. Conserv-atism—that is, the husbanding of all of our strength and all of our resources, and the spending of them wisely and to good and effective uses.

There is one characteristic which I am sure every person who has thought deeply and long over the make-up of the American mind and disposition will agree is and will always be the saving American grace, and that is the virtue of adaptability. We encounter a new and perfectly unfamiliar situation; we do not attempt to bend that situation to preconceived notions. We simply adapt ourselves to it and solve its difficulties according to the wisdom of the event. Indeed, it may well be said that the American characteristic is adaptability. Recognizing then our advantage over the remainder of the world in all that makes for national power and, therefore, for individual success; recognizing, too, the gigantic wastefulness of our past methods, the American of to-day realizes also that for the nation at large and for each citizen thereof a cautious conservatism is the duty of the hour and of the century. I cannot get out of my mind the remark (quoted before in papers in this magazine) of the Japanese statesman: "We hope to prevail in the war with Russia because small resources well organized are more powerful than great resources poorly organized." The reign of waste in America must be at an end—is at an end.

With the American's adaptability, with his love of and insistence upon absolute truth, his demand to know just how his account stands so that he may work according to it, it is a fair conclusion that the young American of the twentieth century will make himself, first of all, a conservative man. There is nothing worse for any of us, nothing worse for a nation, than to run after every hue and cry that is raised, simply because the hue and cry is novel and appears attractive. We must remember that nine-tenths of all propositions advanced are unsound. It is useful to reflect upon the records of the Patent Office. Tens of thousands of inventions prove of no practical moment. It is not meant by this that we should not have hospitality for new ideas. It is meant merely that we should make it the habit of our lives to apply cold common-sense to our enthusiasms.

SENATOR ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE

This may take out of our effort some of its élan, but it will add to it a steadiness of purpose better than any dash. A French soldier of Napoleon declared that "in the attack Frenchmen were incomparably strong—in defeat they were childishly weak; whereas the stolid steadiness of the English was even more admirable when they were beaten than when they were victorious."

The Watchword for the Twentieth Century

THE American of the twentieth century will surely see this—sees it now. He says to himself as he rises in the morning: "My watchword for this day is 'steadiness and poise.'" He declares: "I do not propose to burn my energies up agitating for this ism or that ism. I do not propose to scatter my strength fighting for verbal 'rights' which I am told belong to me. I mean that my work shall be for substantial ends." And so he introduces into his life the rule of the three modern graces—steadiness, system, conservatism.

It is a thing for us Americans to think about, and think about very solidly and very earnestly, and right now. Other peoples will think about it if we do not—do think about it whether we do or not, and act on their thought. It is a fine thing to know just what criticisms your rivals make of you; they are probably sound. And instead of avoiding them one should get hold of them, if one can, and profit by them prayerfully.

"I find," said a foreign statesman to an American gentleman in the course of a very frank interchange of mutual criticisms on the modern method and conduct of their respective peoples, "that you Americans contend too much among yourselves; you waste infinite energy battling against one another. It is a good thing for us. We see our chance. And while you are getting what you call 'rights' from one another we get with our comparatively very insignificant strength much of the fruit which you yourselves might gather for the prosperity of your whole country and the individual happiness of all your citizens."

It was a deep remark, was it not? For do we not find labor and capital in warfare among our very selves? These conflicts, of course, happily are growing less. The hopeful lover of the American people cannot console himself except with the thought that ultimately they will disappear altogether. The American who is developing to-day in all ranks of life is a man upon whose mind the great truth is gradually but surely dawning that the good of each of us is the good of all of us; that there are no separate "rights" of any separate class against another; no "duties" of any class due to another; but that the happiness and the welfare of all of us are to be found only in a hard-headed, unselfish (although, deeply considered, most selfish) consideration of what is best for the whole country.

Many years ago the industrial classes in England began quarreling among themselves. Labor wanted many things. Its demands were made with impatient impulsiveness. The manufacturers, the business men, the capitalists resisted with no large wisdom of method or manner—resisted, indeed, with folly and bullheadedness. There was no conciliation, no getting together, no wholesome reasonableness. Meanwhile, in Germany—polytechnic schools, patient steadiness in industry, saving and creative methods in capital, the slow, sure acquirement of skill and effectiveness. The result is that English labor has become unskilled in comparison with the labor of her continental rivals; that English capital has become impotent and nerveless in comparison with the watchful, confident and aggressive capital of her industrial enemies across the channel; and that English business houses are beginning to find themselves without business and English labor is beginning to find itself without employment. And when this process shall have been completed, when breadless women and children, and men without work shall howl in the streets of London, Birmingham, Manchester and Liverpool, what a spectacle then will the contentions between labor and capital present which have torn industrial and commercial England for a quarter of a century? How much lovelier a picture would conciliation and mutual understanding and sane confidence in each other have presented! And how immeasurably better for English prosperity! With this object-lesson being worked out before our very eyes the American of to-day is not liable to fall into the same abysmal error. Shall we not, rather, quit contending among ourselves and unitedly contend with the world? It would be a sorry picture we should make (with our puissance, our intelligence, our acuteness) if we should find ourselves fighting with one another over a division of spoils which our rivals, during our contention among ourselves, had captured. And so it appears that the word of truth which will be in the mouths of all Americans from the dawn of the twentieth century will be conservatism in method and coöperation and forbearance in thought and action.

The Man Who Goes to the Front

THIS is no preachment. All who have reached mature years have observed that mere precept and counsel bear small results. At best they produce only occasional and spasmodic good. This paper is intended to show young Americans that conservatism and steadiness in individual and national American character necessarily grow out of the situation in which the Nation finds itself. The saving period—the saving of energy and resources—is now as inevitable as the wasting period now past, or at least passing, was natural. And if each American sees that this is so he will himself make daily effort that these elements of character shall be the dominant ones in him. For if this is the order of our time, if this is the necessity of our circumstance, then each one of us will get himself into line and harmony with this system of things. Otherwise, each one of us will find himself working at cross-purposes with the course of events. Usefulness, success, satisfying fruition of all our work are possible only when our work is in harmony with the general sweep of human activities. And this orderly on-going of the affairs of peoples is fixed and determined by natural conditions. What this paper is attempting to show is that these natural conditions require a levelness and discretion of thought and action in American character.

Let the young American ponder this well, and he will see that rashness of scheme and hotheadedness of action and recklessness of method cannot possibly bring him any ultimate good. They are as much "out of gear" with what our internal relationships with one another and our general attitude toward the world at large require of us as the conduct of the highwayman and the forger is antagonistic to the whole scheme of human society. Did you ever think why it is that crime cannot possibly be successful, no matter how able the criminal? It is because the criminal is fighting every settled method of the world. Every device of business becomes a detective; and the criminal's operations are in conflict with the whole course of the daily life of eighty millions of our people—of all people. Let him take precautions ever so cunningly, the criminal finds his maturest plans utterly irrational. For precisely the same reasons the methods of mere dash are irrational and out of date. The systematic, the considerate, the orderly, the conservative—these are the qualities of character which our situation in the world and the present state of our development absolutely require of all Americans. And therefore the type of American now developing and even this moment already to the front is the coolest, steadiest, most thoughtful and practical character which the race has yet produced—a man with daring, but the daring of forethought; with energy, but the continuous energy of purpose; with effectiveness, not spasmodic and instantaneous, but the resistless effectiveness of well-considered and moderate plan.

Although oratory in the old sense of that word is dying out (and an excellent good thing it is), plain speech to the people is increasing in its power and in its results. The political platform is the best place to observe the growth of the very elements set down above as the natural and necessary qualities of American character. In a Central-Western State during a recent political campaign an "orator" of attractiveness and picturesque quality was addressing a large crowd made up principally of farmers. Two gentlemen—students always and everywhere of American tendencies—from the edge of the crowd observed that the audience rapidly melted away. "It is easy to see why," remarked one. "He is appealing to men's passions on unsubstantial grounds; he is announcing propositions attractive on the surface and at the moment of utterance, but harebrained to the thoughtful. And these people are thoughtful. Rural free delivery gives them their daily papers. Their information is as good as the speaker's, and they have acquired that quickness of mental habit characteristic of our rapid age; also, their instinct of soundness is developing astonishingly. So they will not listen to this engaging speaker. What he says offends a sort of conscientiousness of logic in them. They feel that their own capacity for thought and truth is being trifled with."

A week later practically the same audience assembled to listen to another speaker. He spoke boldly, announcing propositions which the old-time player on public passions would have declared surely indiscreet and certainly unpopular. But he spoke most reasonably and, above all things, most frankly. Instead of diminishing, his audience constantly increased. Nothing in the world attracted them and held them but the substantial reasonableness and conservatism of his utterance.

A Text for the Young Politician

THESE two illustrations show how the solid and moderate are developing among the great mass and body of American citizenship. They are sidelights revealing an explanation of the triumph of the conservative cause in our fiercest political battles. Let the young politician who hopes for permanent and enduring success bear in mind that the age of claptrap in our political affairs has passed. He may catch the "groundlings" with it, but he will "make the judicious grieve." And the "judicious" are a majority among Americans, and a steadily augmenting majority.

"I, too, am not a bit tamed. . . .
I sound my barbaric yawp over the roofs of the world," exclaims Walt Whitman. And when he said it a lot of literary gentlemen who knew nothing of the American people wrote beautiful essays about Whitman's being "the untamed soul of our Western democracy." He is nothing of the kind. The chief note in Whitman's unruled and unruly verse is as abhorrent to and out of harmony with American character as the war-whoop of those savages whom our industry and civilization displaced.

Akin to this false note of Whitman are the shaggy and eccentric cries that we hear with decreasing frequency in the political campaigns. Even powerful party leaders still indulge in unrestrained utterance concerning the "down-trodden people," and "the majesty of the people," and "the will of the people," and other familiar catchwords of the demagogue. They do not mean these weighty words in their true sense. They mean them in the Whitman sense. They use them improperly and passionately to influence the popular mind. The will of the people is indeed the noblest thing on this earth. The common thought of the instructed masses must in the end necessarily be the largest human wisdom. But the will of the people is no spasmodic affair. It is the powerful and prudent conclusions of our eighty millions pouring in steady and continuous stream through the years. It is not a thing to be trifled with or played upon. And he who takes some gust of popular passion, conspicuous for a day but disappearing to-morrow and regretted the day after, as the evidence of popular desire, and "plays to" it or plays upon it, not only does not understand American character, but he misuses, misinterprets and insults it.

How comports this theory of caution with the doctrine of masterfulness of the first paper? "It is a philosophy of contradictions you hold," said a talented woman in a company of conversation one evening. She was responding to another who had given voice to something of the same general tenor of these papers. (And how the drift of conversation shows the common thought running through the common mind of the people!) "No, not contradictions, but consistencies," said a third member of the company, "for the very excess of vigor which we Americans possess implies the necessity for regularity and wise direction in its exercise." It is related of James H. Hyde who founded the Equitable Assurance Society on nothing but this rational plan and unconquerable energy, that he said to a young man (also of great power) of a rival company: "You remind me of my own younger days. It seems to me that the young New Yorker of to-day says of a task: 'This takes ten pounds of energy. Very well, I will give it ten pounds and not a pennyweight more.' When I was founding this institution I said to myself: 'Here is a plan; its execution requires ten pounds of energy. Very well, here goes for a hundred.' And I gave it a hundred; but I was very sure that it was a plan worth giving a single ounce of energy to." That was a thoroughly American utterance. The point is that we must not waste our energies on unsubstantial projects. We must choose our course with care; but, having chosen it and considered it, then we must be no miser in the application of our strength to pursuing that course to its triumphant end. And all of our energy and resources are for use, not for mere hoarding. But in the uses to which we devote them there must be forethought and deliberate choosing.

What Waste Effort Leads To

THE more one studies the leaders of the United States Senate the more profoundly is one impressed with the wisdom of their leadership. Men like Allison of Iowa and Platt of Connecticut are high types of effectiveness. An old Senator remarked one day: "Have you ever observed the ponderous magnitude of bills and resolutions which are introduced only to die? Have you observed, too, that many that survive the committee and are pushed with vigor go nevertheless to a certain death? Let me tell you it is because they are not well worked out in advance. Even when they are well worked out as separate propositions they are not carefully considered

Araminta and the Automobile

What Happened to the Man Who Knew How

By Charles Battell Loomis

Author of My Golf, Etc.

—MADE WORK FOR AN ALREADY OVERWORKED LOCAL CARPENTER

SOME persons spend their surplus on works of art; some spend it on Italian gardens and pergolas; there are those who sink it in golf, and I have heard of those who expended it on charity, but these last are comparatively rare.

None of these forms of getting away with money appealed to Araminta and myself. As soon as it was ascertained that the automobile was practicable and would not cost a king's ransom, I determined to devote my savings to the purchase of one.

Araminta and I live in a suburban town; she because she loves Nature and I because I love Araminta. We have been married for five years.

I am a bank clerk in New York, and morning and night I go through the monotony of railway travel, and for one who is forbidden to use his eyes on the train and who does not play cards it is monotony, for in the morning my friends are either playing cards or else reading their paper, and one does not like to urge the claims of conversation on one who is deep in politics or the next play of his antagonist; so my getting to business and coming back are in the nature of purgatory. I therefore hailed the automobile as a Heaven-sent means of swift motion with an agreeable companion and with no danger of encountering either newspapers or cards. I have seen neither reading nor card-playing going on in any automobile.

The community in which I live is not progressive, and when I said that I expected to buy an automobile as soon as my ship came in I was frowned upon by my neighbors. Several of them have horses and others have feet. The horsemen were not more opposed to my proposed ownership than the footmen—I should say pedestrians. They all thought automobiles dangerous and a menace to public peace, but of course I poohpoohed their fears and, being a person of a good deal of stability of purpose, I went on saving my money and in course of time I bought an automobile of the electric sort.

I TELL ARAMINTA THAT IT ISN'T THE RUNNING OF AN AUTOMOBILE THAT IS SO EXPENSIVE. IT IS THE STOPPING OF IT

Araminta is plucky and I am perfectly fearless. When the automobile was brought home and housed in the little barn that is on our property the man who had backed it in told me that he had orders to stay and show me how it worked, but I laughed at him—good-naturedly yet firmly. I said, "Young man, experience teaches more in half an hour than books or precepts do in a year. A would-be newspaper man does not go to a school of journalism if he is wise; he gets a position on a newspaper and learns for himself and through his mistakes. I know that one of these levers is to steer by, that another lets loose the power, and that there is a foot-brake. I also know that the machine is charged and I need to know no more. Good-day."

Thus did I speak to the young man and he saw that I was a person of force and discretion, and he withdrew to the train and I never saw him again.

Araminta had been to Passaic shopping, but she came back while I was out in the barn looking at my new purchase and she joined me there. I looked at her lovingly and she returned the look. Our joint ambition was realized; we were the owners of an automobile and we were going out that afternoon.

Why is it that cheap barns are so flimsily built? I know that our barn is cheap because the rent for house and barn is less than what many a clerk, city pent, pays for a cramped flat, but again I ask, why are they flimsily built? I have no complaint to make. If my barn had been built of good stout oak I might to-day be in a hospital.

It happened this way. Araminta said, "Let me get in and we will take just a little ride to see how it goes," and I out of my love for her said, "Wait just a few minutes, dearest, until I get the hang of the thing. I want to see how much go she has and just how she works."

Araminta has learned to obey my slightest word, knowing that love is at the bottom of all my commands, and she stepped to one side while I entered the gayly painted vehicle and tried to move out of the barn. I moved out. But I backed. Oh, blessed, cheaply-built barn. My way was not restricted to any appreciable extent. I shot gayly through the barn into the hen yard, and the sound of the ripping clapboards frightened the silly hens who were enjoying a dust-bath and they fled in more directions than there were fowls.

I had not intended entering the hen yard and I did not wish to stay there, so I kept on out, the wire netting not being what an automobile would call an obstruction. I never lose my head, and when I heard Araminta screaming in the barn I called out cheerily to her, "I'll be back in a minute, dear, but I'm coming another way."

And I did come another way. I came all sorts of ways. I really don't know what got into the machine, but she now turned to the left and made for the road, and then she ran along on her two left wheels for a moment, and then seemed about to turn a somersault but changed her mind, and, still veering to the left, kept on up the road, passing my house at a furious speed and making for the open country. With as much calmness as I could summon I steered her, but I think I steered her a little too much, for she turned toward my house.

I reached one end of the front piazza at the same time that Araminta reached the other end of it. I had the right of way and she deferred to me just in time. I removed the vestibule storm door. It was late in March and I did not think we should have any more use for it that season. And we didn't.

I had ordered a strongly-built machine and I was now glad of it, because a light and weak affair that was merely meant to run along on a level and unobstructed road would not have stood the assault on my piazza. Why, my piazza did not stand it. It caved in and made work for an already overworked local carpenter who was behindhand with his orders. After I had passed through the vestibule I applied the brake and it worked. The path is not a cinder one, as I think them untidy, so I was not more than muddied. I was up in an instant and looked at the still enthusiastic machine with admiration.

"Have you got the hang of it?" said Araminta.

Now that's one thing I like about Araminta. She does not waste words over non-essentials. The point was not that I had damaged the piazza. I needed a new one, anyway. The main thing was that I was trying to get the hang of the machine and she recognized that fact instantly.

I told her that I thought I had and that if I had pushed the lever in the right way at first I should have come out of the barn in a more conventional way.

She again asked me to let her ride, and as I now felt that I could better cope with the curves of the machine I allowed her to get in.

"Don't lose your head," said I.

"I hope I sha'n't," said she dryly.

"Well, if you have occasion to leave me, drop over the back. Never jump ahead. That is a fundamental rule in runaways of all kinds."

Then we started and I ran the motor along for upward of half a mile after I had reached the highway, which I did by a short cut through a field at the side of our house. There is only a slight rail fence surrounding it and my machine made little of that. It really seemed to delight in what some people would have called danger.

"Araminta, are you glad that I saved up for this?"

"I am mad with joy," said the dear thing, her face flushed with excitement mixed with expectancy. Nor were her expectations to be disappointed. We still had a good deal to do before we should have ended our first (and last) ride.

So far I had damaged property to a certain extent, but I had no one but myself to reckon with and I was providing work for people. I always have claimed that he who makes work for two men where there was only work for one before is a public benefactor, and that day I was the friend of carpenters and other mechanics.

Along the highway we flew, our hearts beating high, but never in our mouths, and at last we saw a team approaching us. By "a team" I mean a horse and buggy. I was raised in Connecticut where a team is anything you chose to call one.

The teamster saw us. Well, perhaps I should not call him a teamster (although he was one logically): he was our doctor, and, as I say, he saw us.

Now I think it would have been friendly in him, seeing that I was more or less of a novice at the art of automobiling, to have turned to the left when he saw that I was inadvertently turning to the left, but the practice of forty years added to a certain native obstinacy made him turn to the right and he met me at the same time that I met him.

The horse was not hurt, for which I am truly glad, and the doctor joined us and continued with us for a season, but his buggy was demolished.

Of course I am always prepared to pay for my pleasure, and though it was not strictly speaking my pleasure to deprive my physician of his turn-out, yet if he had turned out it wouldn't have happened—and, as I say, I was prepared to get him a new vehicle. But he was very unreasonable; so much so that as he was crowding us—for the seat was not built for more than two, and he is stout—I at last told him that I intended to turn around and carry him home, as we were out for pleasure and he was giving us pain.

I will confess that the events of the last few minutes had rattled me somewhat and I did not feel like turning just then, as the road was narrow. I knew that the road turned of its own accord a half mile farther on and so I determined to wait.

"I want to get out," said the doctor tartly, and just as he said so Araminta stepped on the brake, accidentally. The doctor got out—in front. With great presence of mind I reversed and so we did not run over him. But he was furious and sulphurous, and that is why I have changed to homœopathy. He was the only allopathic doctor in Brantford.

I suppose if I had stopped and apologized he would have made up with me and I should not have got angry with him, but I couldn't stop. The machine was now going as she had done when I left the barn and we were backing into town.

Through it all I did not lose my coolness. I said, "Araminta, look out behind, which is ahead for us, and if you have occasion to jump now, do it in front, which is behind," and Araminta understood me. She is quick-witted.

She sat sideways so that she could see what was going on, but that might have been seen from any point of view, for we were the only things going on—or backing.

Pretty soon we passed the wreck of the buggy and then we saw the horse grazing on dead grass by the roadside, and at last we came on a few of our townfolk who had seen us start and were now come out to welcome us home. But I did not go home just then. I should have done so if the machine had minded me and turned in at our driveway, but it did not.

Across the way from us there is a fine lawn leading up to a beautiful greenhouse full of rare orchids and other plants. It is the pride of my very good neighbor, Jacob Rawlinson.

The machine, as if moved by malice prépense, turned just as we came to the lawn and began to back at railroad speed.

I told Araminta that if she was tired of riding, now was the best time to stop; that she ought not to overdo it, and that I was going to get out myself as soon as I had seen her off.

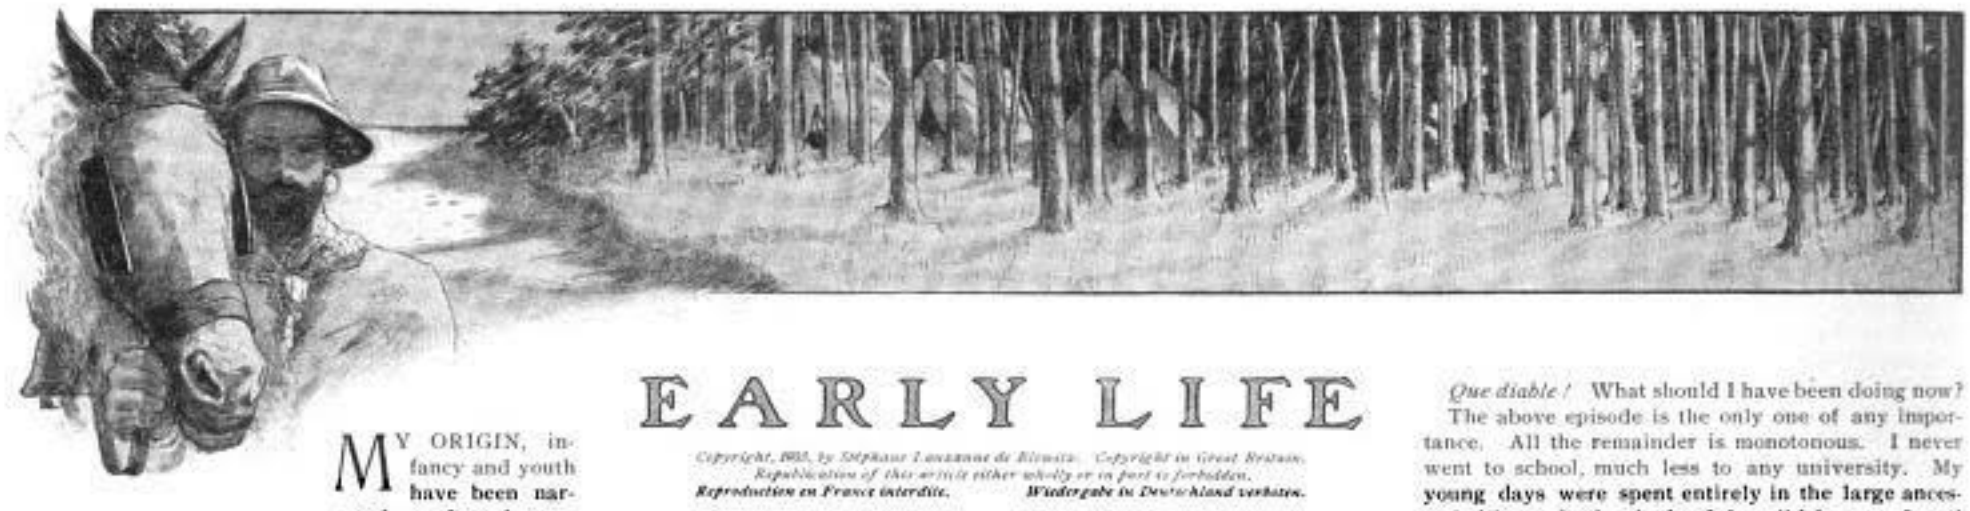
I saw her off.

Then after one ineffectual jab at the brake I left the machine myself, and as I sat down on the sposhy lawn I heard a tremendous but not unmusical sound of falling glass. . . .

I tell Araminta that it isn't the running of an automobile that is so expensive. It is the stopping of it.

For Record-Making Runs

A SPEED indicator for vehicles to record the distance traveled and the time made on every successive mile will interest chauffeurs and drivers of spirited horses.



A toothed wheel is advanced one point by every revolution of the wheel of the vehicle with which it is associated. This movement connects with a pointer moving around a dial whereon is indicated to the occupant of the vehicle the distance traveled. Working automatically in connection with the indicator is a stop watch or other similar timepiece.

The invention may be set to record the time traveled per mile or for any fraction of a mile. At the moment of starting the vehicle the stop watch in the indicating device is set in operation and the distance to be timed determined. When that distance has been covered the timepiece is automatically arrested, the time consumed recorded, and by automatic adjustment the watch is ready instantly for the next division of the journey. The cycle of operations may be continued as long as the vehicle is in motion.

Thus the driver of a fast horse is enabled to time his animal's speed to a second on any portion of the distance traveled. A chauffeur by consulting the dial before him may learn to a nicety whether he is exceeding speed limits.

SOME TURNING POINTS IN THE CAREER OF M. de BLOWITZ. HOW A GIPSY FORTUNE-TELLER AND A BROKEN PIPE-STEM POINTED THE ROAD TO FAME

MY ORIGIN, infancy and youth have been narrated so often that no one will, I hope, find fault with me if, in my turn, I myself give an account of them. Since they have appeared sufficiently interesting for others to relate, I also have acquired the right to do so without being taxed with presumption. In any case, I venture to say that, instead of the fantastic tales which have appeared, nothing but "information derived from an absolutely authorized source" will be found in the following pages. In writing these lines, which will not appear until after I am in the grave, I have but one ambition: that of saying the truth, all the truth; and I have but one desire: that of preventing persons from disfiguring, for their own pleasure or passion, events with which I have been closely connected.

On December 28, 1825, at the Château of Blowsky, in the region of Pilsna, in Bohemia, there was born a child with a big head and a feeble body. The doctors who had been summoned to his bedside shook their heads in silence and declared that "he had a weak heart and was ill-formed," and consequently he would not live. The child's mother thereupon decided that the proper thing to do was to have him baptized without delay. And so, on December 29, while the snow was falling heavily and a strong wind was carrying off a peal of bells, he was conveyed to the little chapel of the little village of Blowsky, and there the Rev. Father Wasck, arch-priest of the parish, administered to him the holy sacrament of baptism. At the same time, on the old register of the church which contained the names of all his ancestors, from Seigneur Kaspar de Blowitz of Pulatine, who founded the village school, to Seigneur Marc Opper de Blowitz, who owned the ancient château, he entered the new-born child under the names of Henri-Georges-Stephan Adolphe, and said a mass in order that God might allow him to live.

I should not be telling the truth were I to say that I recall all these facts, for however good my memory may be it is not capable of that. But they have been affirmed to me so often by my mother, repeated by the venerable arch-priest and denied by the doctor, that finally I am absolutely persuaded they are true. The parish register may, however, be taken as evidence; it leaves no doubt as to my having been born a Catholic, baptized twenty-four hours after my birth, and that I did not have time to become a Jew. I regret it, moreover, . . . for Israel!

Of my early childhood I remember but little; the few incidents that I am able to recall do not appear to me worthy of being rendered public.

I will say, however, one thing. When I was six years of age but little was wanting—that little being a bridge over a stream—for me never to have been correspondent of the Times. This is what happened:

An Adventure with Kidnapers

ONE summer's evening there was nobody at home in the paternal château. My father was away hunting in the environs with some of his lordly friends and my mother was absent. I was playing in the park when, at a turn of the road, an old worn-out gipsy-cart appeared on the scene. It was drawn by an emaciated horse and driven by a sordid old woman in shreds. A pale and wretched-looking man followed. In the vehicle were some raggedly garbed children, among them being a little girl with a beautifully dressed Polichinelle. The fact is the doll Punch was altogether too beautifully dressed.

What took place? Did the man take me by the hand? Did the woman speak to me? I have forgotten, but what I have not forgotten is the attractive Polichinelle and its bright black eyes. Ten minutes afterward I was being rolled along in the gipsy-cart. I had been kidnaped! It seemed to me as if new life had suddenly been infused into the emaciated horse, whose pace was quickened and the tired-looking man pushed the cart so as to advance faster.

"If you are a good boy," said the woman, "we will let you play the drum and blow a trumpet all the time." And, in order to give me an advance taste of these future pleasures, they brought out from the back of the vehicle an old box, which when unpacked was found to contain—helter-skelter—costumes, drums, wigs, horns, all things that I had greatly admired at the recent village fête.

"Have you got a locket on you?" was a question asked me by the young girl with the beautiful black eyes.

I answered by showing her a small gold locket hanging from a chain round my neck and which my mother had given me.

"All right," she said, somewhat sadly, "be sure and keep it, and always tell everybody that your mother placed it there. I have one also—look; and I keep it; but my mother has never come to claim me yet."

The Pursuit and the Rescue

OUR ride in the cart continued without a halt for five or six hours and we must have covered quite a respectable distance, when suddenly, far away in the silence of the forest, we heard shouts and the sounds of the hunting horn.

"They are looking for us," said the woman.

The man uttered an oath and whipped the horse. The little girl with the black eyes grasped my hand, and in a very low voice said to me:

"It is better it should be thus; it is preferable that they should find you; you don't know what is in store for you if you remain with us."

I was very much amused and I looked about and listened. Evidently at the château my absence had been remarked and they were looking for me.

A terrible race ensued. The horse seemed suddenly endowed with fresh vigor as if he were conscious of the chase. In the distance the sounds of the horn were distinguishable, first a long way off, then nearer, and then far away again. Will they overtake us? Will they not overtake us?

Until now we had been driving along one solitary road which brusquely ran into a glade and two roads appeared. Which were we going to take? The one on the right or the one on the left? The man, who had not ceased swearing, hesitated. And here I firmly believe my fate was settled. If he had taken the road on the right I do not know where I should have been at this hour.

But he took the one on the left which led us down a little hill toward a river. After another mile the stream appeared, but there was no bridge across it. The road went no farther. As we reached this spot the horns were blowing louder than ever. The clamors of a number of men on horseback could be heard plainer and plainer. There could no longer be any doubt; they were in pursuit and about to overtake us. The spare man and the ragged woman and the wretched children certainly understood what was going forth, for they quickly abandoned horse, cart, boxes, and all their possessions, and threw themselves into the water; they swam across and two minutes later could be seen running away at full speed on the other side of the river.

I remained alone in the gipsy-cart, alone with Polichinelle. A few minutes later my father, for he was among the men on horseback, found us lying down quietly in the rear of the cart. I had been found. I was taken back home. I do not know whether they said anything to Polichinelle, but I do know that they said something to me! And I also know very well that, if the gipsy who had kidnaped me had taken the road on the right which disappeared in the mountain mazes, I should never have been found.

Que diable! What should I have been doing now?

The above episode is the only one of any importance. All the remainder is monotonous. I never went to school, much less to any university. My young days were spent entirely in the large ancestral château, in the shade of the wild forest. I read and worked but little. I walked a great deal. My memory, which all my lifetime has been my powerful and precious auxiliary, was formed almost entirely alone. It was innate and natural. It required no training.

In my father's room there used to be an enormous stick with a gold knob which I always admired and envied. Every time I saw it I used to ask for it, and every time I asked for it I used to long to have it and keep it.

One day my father said to me:

"Listen: I will give you this stick if to-morrow you recite to me by heart the legend of Kosros the Wise."

That was a way of getting rid of me, for the Hungarian legend of Kosros the Wise is quite as long as Shakespeare's Hamlet, and Sir Henry Irving will tell you that twenty-four hours constitute a very short time for one to learn Hamlet.

Nevertheless, the following day I went to my father's room and, without a mistake or hesitation, I recited to him all the wonderful legend, from the day when the daughter of Kosros chose for a husband Pryémilas, a mere laborer, until the day when his sister, Wlasta, at the head of an army of Amazons, won, with the aid of the Czechs, the battle of the White Mountain.

The stick with the gold knob became my property. I did not keep it; but, thank Heaven, I kept my memory.

At the age of fifteen, after a somewhat rudimentary education that, nevertheless, included various poetic legends, which I learnt whenever I had a longing for some of the parental belongings, my father decided that I should travel. He supplied me with money and gave me as a companion a tutor, who had taken his degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

I started out one morning on foot and was soon lost in the distance, en route for unknown parts.

I think I must have traveled through the whole of the immense Empire of Austria. It was not, at that time, what civilization has made it at the present day. In the frontier provinces superstition and fanaticism reigned supreme. During my long peregrinations I had striking examples of both and they have left on my mind an indelible impression.

The Stolen Statue of St. John

NOT very far from my native village was a quiet little country town called Grunberg. Any travelers who might nowadays venture to explore this little out-of-the-world nook of Bohemia would notice, close by a peaceful pool, an old church, an odd mixture of all styles of architecture. It is a very poor, modest little church, but it possesses a life-size statue of St. John in massive silver. Curiously enough, this statue has only one arm, and one would be inclined to protest against this willful mutilation if it were not connected with a strange incident of which I was a witness.

The day after I had left my father's château I arrived at Grunberg and found the whole town in the wildest state of excitement. The statue of St. John had been stolen the week before, and the whole country round had been doing everything possible to find it. The Bishop of Klattau had ordered processions in all the neighboring districts and every day the priest of St. John's beseeched his parishioners to tell what they knew of the theft.

I have already spoken of a small pool which is near the church. This pool was surrounded by a bank which was very steep on the side near the water and at the top of which was a narrow path. The procession was about to take place just as I arrived, and, in order to reach the other side of the pool, it had to walk along this narrow path.

At the head of the procession was the old priest, praying as he walked along, and carrying a second relic, which was almost as much venerated as the statue. This relic was a silver cross.

Half-way along the path—I can see the whole scene distinctly—the priest stumbled against the roots of a newly-planted tree, and, before he had time to think of saving it, the cross fell from his hands, glided slowly down the bank and disappeared in the muddy waters of the pool.

All the people, following the example of the unfortunate priest, fell on their knees, their eyes fixed on the spot in the water where the cross had disappeared.

The dam was at once opened so that the water should not carry the sacred relic away and every one waited for several hours. At the end of that time, to the delight of all, just as the last water was disappearing through the dam, the cross was seen and by the side of the cross the statue—the famous silver statue of St. John.

A cry of joy rang through the air, the cross and the statue were taken up, and it was then that the disappearance of the left arm was discovered. The thieves, whilst waiting for an opportunity of conveying the statue to a safe place, had broken off this arm, which has never been found.

The people, singing psalms and hymns of thanksgiving as they went along, repaired to the church in order to replace the venerated statue on the pedestal which for the last week had been deprived of its sacred burden. Just as the last individual was entering the church a part of the archway over the doors gave way, fell straight on the shoulders of a peasant and cut off his left arm as clean as though it had been a chopper.

The crowd immediately surrounded the wretched man, yelling:

"He's the thief! He's the thief! St. John has punished him by cutting off his arm!"

There was a terrible rush from all sides. The people attacked the peasant and in a moment his clothes were all in shreds. They were about to drag him along and hurl him into the pool in his turn, without having asked him a question, or without even hesitating as to whether or not he were the real author of the theft, when the old priest interfered.

"I, alone, have the right to command here," he said. "Do not touch that man!"

The crowd fell back a little and the priest continued:

"You are in my church," he said, addressing himself to the peasant, "and this is an inviolable and sacred place. No one has a right to touch you here. Stay inside the church and do not leave it, for once outside you belong to human justice."

And the mutilated peasant remained there. He was in the church all day and all night and he was still there the following day when I left Grunberg.

Five years later, when my voyage through Europe was accomplished, as I passed through Grunberg on my way to my native village, I saw at the door of St. John's Church an old man who had lost his left arm. He was on his knees at the threshold of the sanctuary which he had never dared to leave lest he should be torn to pieces by the people.

One evening, after a long journey, I reached, with my traveling companion, the Croatian frontier. A dreary-looking rough road stretched as far as the eye could see, alongside the mountain, and poles were placed on the roadside at intervals, just as in France the telegraph poles are seen forming a straight line along the banks of a road.

At the top of these poles human heads had been fixed, and I shuddered with horror on discovering that as far as one could see there were these poles and these heads. There had been a revolt the week before, and the Governor of the district, who had proved victorious, had decided to make an example and to inspire the population with a wholesome fear.

This Governor I can see distinctly now. I was dining that evening with my tutor in a wretched little inn, on the very borders of the frontier, when he came back from his expedition. He was a sort of bashi-bazouk with a booked nose, long, fair mustache and a face with a hard expression. He had three escorts, the commanders of each of which appeared to hate each other.

I could not resist asking him, later, when he was sitting next me at table, why he had three escorts.

"The first one," he answered, "keeps watch on the second, and the third prevents the other two from coming to an understanding with each other."

This will give an idea of the social position of the Governor of Croatia in the first half of the last century.

The Episode of the Gipsy Fortune-Teller

AFTER supper, while the Governor was smoking a long pipe and the officers of the escort were playing at dice, we heard outside, issuing from the darkness, a dismal cry followed by shouts, disputes and fighting. The officers left their dice and the Governor mechanically put his hand to his belt, from which his sword was hanging.

Upon inquiry we found it was nothing of importance, merely a woman, a kind of fortune-teller, who was going along the road when the bashi-bazouks of the escort had set upon her. The Governor suggested that it would be amusing to have our fortunes told. We each of us gave her some silver and she proceeded to foretell the future with the cards. The poor creature was intent on the cards, and in a slow, monotonous voice she told us her rigmarole.

When she came to me, though, she suddenly became more animated and her dull eyes lighted up a little.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, "I've never seen a fortune like yours. There is a fine fate in store for you!"

"What is it?" I asked.

"You'll sit down with kings and have princes at your table."

She did not tell me any more, but that was quite enough, and all night long I dreamt of nothing but conquest and kingdoms. I tried to imagine all the situations which would allow me to sit down with sovereigns, but I never thought of the only one which could ever enable the prophecy to come true.

This voyage was to last five years, and five years it lasted. I went through Germany, Russia, Austria, Italy and Switzerland. The most tragic part of it was the return home.

I was just twenty years of age, and when I approached my native village all the memories of my childhood crowded to my mind.

One learns a great many things in a five years' journey through the world, and one forgets much also, very quickly. Suddenly at a turn in the road, flanked by the mountain, the Château of Blowsky came in sight, and I do not know how it was, but as soon as I saw its old, cracked façade, so gloomy and dismal-looking, as soon as I glanced at its dark, mysterious tower, a sort of presentiment took possession of me.

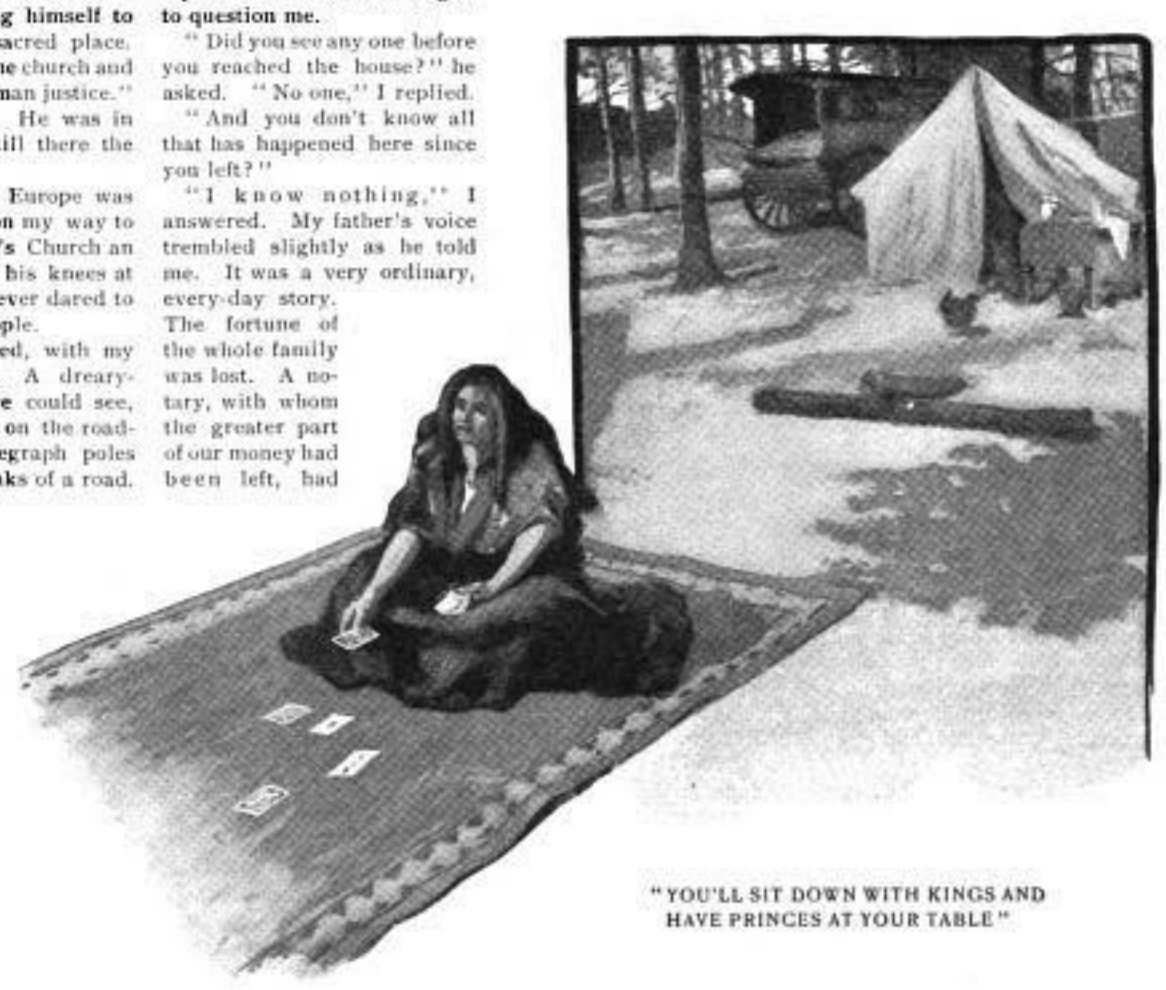
I hurried on and soon reached the park. It seemed to me that everything looked neglected and rather deserted. The grass was long and the meadows appeared to be untended. I pushed the door open, and a cry rang through the house. It was my mother.

"Where is father?" I asked anxiously. "Here he is," she replied; and seated by the fire in the dining-room I saw him, but he was so changed that I scarcely recognized him.

When the first excitement of my arrival was over he began to question me.

"Did you see any one before you reached the house?" he asked. "No one," I replied.

"And you don't know all that has happened here since you left?"



"I know nothing," I answered. My father's voice trembled slightly as he told me. It was a very ordinary, every-day story. The fortune of the whole family was lost. A notary, with whom the greater part of our money had been left, had risked it in speculations which had turned out badly, and, to sum up the matter briefly, we were ruined. "You'll have to work for your living," said my father in conclusion. I do not know why, but the thought of the gipsy woman, whom I had seen at the Croatian frontier, suddenly crossed my mind, and I remembered her prediction. I did not appear at all discouraged; on the contrary, I smiled as I answered my father:

"All right," I said; "don't you worry yourself about me; I shall be able to earn my living."

"What do you think of doing?" he asked.

"I shall start to-morrow for France, and from there go to America. A year ago, when I was in Genoa, I made the acquaintance of one of the leading industrial men of Ohio. He offered me a situation in a big agricultural affair out there. I refused, but I shall go to him now, and I am certain he will give me employment."

"That is right," said my father. "I see that you have plenty of determination."

"YOU'LL SIT DOWN WITH KINGS AND HAVE PRINCES AT YOUR TABLE"

The evening, however, was very sad, and that night was the last I spent in my father's house. Life was before me, full of chances and unexpected things. I did not fear anything, but bravely decided to venture forth. The farewell moment was even more sad than the evening had been. My mother was in tears and my father, who was very pale, stood on the terrace until I was out of sight.

"Good-by," I said, and my last words were: "Perhaps you will never see me again, but I hope you will hear something about me." And I plunged into the unknown . . . into life. . . .

Fate and a Broken Pipestem

A FEW weeks later I arrived at Angiers, in France, on the banks of the Loire, on my way to Havre, where I intended to take the boat for America.

I traveled in what the French call a "diligence," which was merely a horrible carriage, badly built, badly appointed, and with wretched horses. If modern civilization had done nothing but give us railways instead of the diligence, it would deserve the gratitude of all human beings; I mean, of course, of all human beings who travel.

My particular diligence went along that wonderful and admirable road, which all English and Americans who have visited France know so well, and which skirts the banks of the Loire. It started from Tours, passed through Angiers, and was to go on to Nantes. At Nantes I intended traveling by water to Havre, where I hoped to embark for the United States.

As we entered the chief street of Angiers something occurred which was destined to influence my whole career. This was the second incident which decided my fate in life. The first was the road which the gipsies, who had kidnaped me, took to cross the river. This second incident happened in driving over the paving-stones of Angiers, when the diligence gave such jolts that the stem of my pipe broke between my teeth.

My first care in getting out of the conveyance was, of course, to rush to a shop for a new stem. I had scarcely finished this most prosaic transaction when on leaving the shop I knocked up against a tall, slight man with hair just turning gray who happened to be coming in. I apologized, but the gentleman, after gazing at me intently, suddenly exclaimed:

"Why, upon my word, I think I recognize you. . . . Are you not young Blowitz?"

"Certainly."

"Don't you remember me?"

"Not at all."

"I saw you five or six years ago at your father's château. I am Count Kolowrath; an old friend of your family."

I remembered now having seen the Count in the days gone by and I recognized him. We talked together a few minutes, and I told him the sad events that had taken place at our home in Bohemia. He took the greatest interest in my story and insisted on my letting the diligence continue its journey without me and delaying my departure for a day. He was only passing through Angiers and lived in Paris, where he was very intimate with all the political men of the day.

The result of our meeting was that I did not start for America the next day, nor yet the day after, nor even the week after, but I went with him to Paris.

Serious events were then taking place there. A Republic—the Republic of 1848—had succeeded the Monarchy of King Louis-Philippe. I was too much interested in all that was going on, too much taken up by this political fever, by this overthrowing of a Government, and by this destruction of old-established institutions, to think of going to America. I remained in Paris, and I observed what was happening around me.

I must now make a confession to my readers. Nature, cities and countries have never had much attraction for me.

HIS MOTHER

The Story of the Second Generation

By Will Payne

HE AND HIS MOTHER WERE CHUMS

I

WHEN the Blue Ridge Bank failed, good, fond, slipshod Tom Lucas, who had been bookkeeper and man of all work at $75 a month, was left without employment. It was a bad time in Blue Ridge and in Western Nebraska generally; but Lucas got a few odd jobs while he was waiting for something to turn up, and with that and his credit the family managed to get on in an increasingly poor way.

Then he had an inspiration. It was long before the Klondike rush, but some people knew there was gold in Alaska. Lucas sold the story-and-a-half house, borrowed what he could, left $100 with his wife, and joined an expedition. They never knew just how he died up in the north, but they knew they were happier for not knowing just how.

Nellie Lucas was small and slim, with brown eyes and a soft voice. In Blue Ridge they called her extravagant, because while Tom had his salary and credit she bought pretty things for herself to wear and dressed her boy ridiculously well and went back to Ohio at least once a year. Now her father was gone as well as Tom, and she had the boy. Her fingers were deft and she was tasteful. She trimmed hats in Miss Davit's millinery store, and the county clerk, a Blue Ridge man, gave her some copying to do now and then.

Walter was nine years old, not very tall for his age, but plump, with reddish hair and blue eyes like his father. He and his mother were chums. They took their treats together when there was a spare dollar, and talked over ways and means soberly. "There will be very little money now, dear—only what mamma can earn; so you must make the old jacket do even if it is patched," she had said to him, and he had understood at once. He wished to quit school and go to work, but she would not hear of that.

They got along—but there was the operation on the boy's throat which Doctor Howell had warned her must not be put off longer.

The Railroad Hospital at Warrensville stood on the shabby street that faced the switch-yards. The hospital itself was a square, neat, two-story affair of pressed brick with a clean cement walk in front; but on one side were two shanty saloons and on the other, a shanty "delicatessen store," with links of sausage and moons of cheese behind the fly-specked window-panes. With the early melting of the light snow which had fallen the day before, the unpaved street was muddy this bright Sunday morning.

Leaving the caboose of the early freight from Blue Ridge, Mrs. Lucas picked her way across the cinder switch-yard and along the broken plank-walk toward the hospital, the boy at her side. She was aware of the wide, bright, Sunday stillness that lay over the small city, of the edge of spring in the high blue sky and clear, chilly air. But her heart trembled in its rapid beating and she kept repeating to herself mechanically, "I must tell them his heart isn't very strong."

She knew it was best not to talk to him about it; but at the door of the hospital she stopped, stooping a little to look into his rosy face. "You won't be afraid, will you, dear?" her sweet voice said.

"Why, no, I won't be afraid," he replied securely.

Doctor Parker had not yet arrived, and Mrs. Lucas went to the office. The old gentleman at the desk treated her crustily, but she did not mind that. She apologized patiently when she answered his questions amiss as he made out the record, and she was strangely absorbed in regarding the fringe of gray hair around his pink head. She took the fee, fifty dollars, from the knotted handkerchief in the breast of her dress. That left her six dollars. When she returned to the chilly little parlor Walter was walking about, cap in hand, examining the prints on the wall. She sat down, furtively watching the boy, and she kept whispering in her mind, "No, I'll not have it done now; I'll put it off; the surgeon will examine him and say it is not necessary."

Doctor Parker came in briskly, half an hour late, a tall, alert man with a red beard and a friendly eye.

"I thought you'd be waiting," he said with a laugh. "You've been to the office? You told them you were here? And this is—Walter, is that the name? How do you do, Walter? I'll go upstairs and see if the room is ready. You come up in a minute. They'll show you where."

And before she could find her voice he was gone. She felt her heart leaving her body and hurrying after him. She wished to say, "I have decided to put it off a while. You see, I have not loved him enough yet."

After a bewildered moment she arose, half dazed. The boy came to her at once and slipped his plump hand in hers. They walked down the hall and up the stairs. She knew that she must not talk to him about it, nor do anything that would alarm him, and as she went upstairs she felt herself clutched fast in the ordeal, without possibility of escape. They came out in the upper hall. Walter walked along beside her as readily as though he were going to play. Yet he seemed such a little fellow.

"You feel ready, do you, dear?" she asked, although she knew she should not.

He slipped his arm about her waist and quickly withdrew it. "Yes, I'm ready, mother," he said. "I know it must be done, so the sooner I go through with it the better."

A stout nurse, hurrying along with a tray of empty dishes, directed them; but the room was not quite ready and they sat on a bench in the hall. She felt the boy's soft body against her side. If she could hide him from them now!

The opposite door opened and Doctor Parker looked out. He had taken off his coat and waistcoat, and put on a long white apron which a nurse was tying behind. His shirt-sleeves were rolled up to the elbows and he was rubbing his hands with soap.

"You're here?" he called out cheerfully. "We'll be ready now as soon as you are. You can step in there."

They entered an empty room, where Walter undressed and put on a nightgown, his mother helping him as when he had been a tiny child. Lingering over the buttons she hungered to close him in her arms and kiss him.

When they stepped into the operating-room Doctor Parker was still scrubbing his hands. His assistant was laying out various instruments of speckless steel that glistened cruelly. He and the surgeon were talking of another case in a casual, chatty way. One nurse was preparing bandages while the other arranged the curtains over the skylight. The operating table, a thick slab of glass, with apparatus for raising and lowering it, stood in the centre of the floor.

In his nightgown the boy looked even younger and rosier. His bare, plump feet showed under the edge of the gown. He smiled in a self-conscious way, embarrassed at standing before strangers in that garb.

A nurse stepped beside the glass slab. "All right, Walter; here's where we'll have you," she said cheerfully.

The boy's hand moved a little toward his mother's. He wished to whisper to her, "They're not going to hurt me, are they, mamma?" But he knew what her white face meant, and without speaking he went forward confidently and climbed on the table. The nurse threw a sheet over him and began arranging cloths about his head and neck. He looked over at his mother and smiled. "Pretty rocky bed, ma," he called.

Mrs. Lucas caught the surgeon's eye and beckoned. He came over to her and she whispered, "You'll be careful, doctor—about the chloroform—his heart isn't very strong."

He nodded. "Oh, yes, I remember. Doctor Howell told me. We talked it over," he said cheerfully under his breath.

He knew that her nerves were shaking and her heart swooned. He looked into the pretty, helpless little woman's straining eyes and took in their wordless message—"To you I give my darling to be led through the shadows of death; if your hand fails he will never come back to me."

This busy surgeon had received many such messages and had replied in his heart, as now, "God is great. I will do what a man's skill can do."

His words to her were, "This operation is not so serious; but it's not pleasant to see. When we are ready you must step out."

She had supposed that she would be permitted to remain. But she understood that she must submit to the doctor. He looked at her and nodded toward the door. She stepped into the hall, shutting the door behind her, closing in the still little figure and those who were to work at the springs of his life.

She sat on the bench in the hall, facing the closed door . . . how long! A formless thought kept drifting back and bruising her helpless mind—she was alone, all alone—she sat there all alone . . . how long! Her heart stopped beating. Surely something had gone wrong. Suddenly she saw them vainly trying to restore him. Yet she could not go to the door. She was bound and could only wait. She remembered with a kind of inconsequential torture that she had only six dollars left after paying the fee in advance. He must be dead. . . . The widow and the fatherless. She remembered something vaguely; then, strangely, it flashed upon her: there was a God. The thought startled her. It was sweet, yet she trembled over it. Something vast encompassed her and her weak misery.

The door stood open. Doctor Parker was smiling at her.

She sprang up and the roots of her hair stirred. Did He give the boy back to her? The doctor was holding the door open for her, smiling. One of the nurses was smiling out at her. She knew from their faces that the operation had been a success. But it was not that just now. Had He——

Suddenly she drooped against the door-casing and put her hands to her face.

"There, there! This is no time to cry. It's all over. Everything's tiptop." Doctor Parker encouraged her, patting her shoulder in a fatherly way.

The boy, quite white, was looking about blankly. In a moment he made her out, smiled a little under his bandages, and sung out, "Hello, ma!"

II

THEY left the hospital after the third day. Mrs. Lucas then had four dollars in her purse. For six months the ordeal of this operation had been her sole focal point, beyond which she had scarcely tried to look. She had sold the last of her trinkets for the fee, and she had supposed, indefinitely, that she should go back to Blue Ridge and try to support herself and keep Walter in school. But the last two days she had been thinking that over, and it seemed to her that she might get something to do in Warrensville, which was a much better town than Blue Ridge, quite a little city, in fact. She wrote a neat hand, slowly, and she thought she might get copying to do, or trim hats, or clerk in a store. As to ways of earning money her imagination was as vague and simple as Walter's. She was anxiously aware of the slimness of her means, but the dreadful ordeal was passed. The boy skipped along beside her abounding in health, full of zest for the fresh air.

Compared with poor little Blue Ridge, Warrensville was metropolitan, with brick paving on the two principal streets, and stone flaggings and brave shop windows.

Mother and son walked down Warren Avenue, stopping to look into the show windows. She had the daring thought to enter at once a dry-goods store that they passed and ask for a place as a clerk; but she put it off because she had not yet spoken to the boy about the possibility of not returning to Blue Ridge. At the window of the millinery store they debated whether the hat with pink or the one with blue was the prettiest, and before the window of the hardware store he explained why the hammerless shotgun was the best. She noted a small restaurant on a side street, and thought they could come back there and get dinner. Probably it would not cost over forty or fifty cents for both of them. There were many more people on the street than at home. The stir of a larger life amused them.

They were looking at the boys' suits, displayed on wax dummies in the window of the most pretentious of the stores, when a brisk little woman tripped out of the store door, glanced at them, halted, then ran forward.

"Why, Mrs. Terhune!" said Mrs. Lucas.

"Why, Mrs. Lucas!" said Janet Terhune.

There was a touch of embarrassment, for Mrs. Terhune had been Janet Hynes and was a daughter of the junior partner in the Blue Ridge Bank where Lucas had been employed, and they had scarcely seen each other since Lucas' death. But in the slightly embarrassed shock of this encounter the hearts of the two women beat up together. A moment, and Mrs. Lucas was telling about the operation.

"And are you going back to Blue Ridge?" Mrs. Terhune asked.

"Well—I hardly know," said Mrs. Lucas. "You see, I must find something to do and I thought perhaps here——" Already, with an indefinable relief, she felt the other woman's greater capability, her firmer hand.

"You must come up to dinner with me now," said Janet decisively. "I'm sure something can be found here—better than in Blue Ridge. We'll talk it over with Bob."

And in this way mother and son came under the wing of the Terhunes. Bob and Janet were at once fond of them. "They're both dear children," said Terhune. He found copying for Mrs. Lucas to do in his office, and with slow, infinite patience she finally learned stenography.

Mother and son were still chums. Every one liked the lad. Janet loved him next to his mother and next to her own daughter who was born the year after the Lucases came to Warrensville.

The Terhunes soon discovered that he had a good mind. At eighteen he finished his course in the public high-school and it was decided that he should go to the State University at Lincoln. His head then came just above Terhune's shoulder, but to the two fond women he was still the same bright, clean, lovable boy that he had been any time the last ten years. His cheeks were as ruddy, his blue eyes as direct, his laugh as ready.

Mrs. Lucas was full of misgivings about his going to Lincoln. He had scarcely been away from home overnight in his life. He couldn't take care of his clothes; was careless about letting things lie around. If he slept in a draft he would take cold. There had been some typhoid at Lincoln the year before, and she was anxious on that score. She did not fear the temptations and dissipations that other mothers might have feared. She supposed in time he might take to smoking. Most boys did that, and Mr. Terhune had prepared her for it. But as for the real vices—why, as well fear that little Janet who still sat on Walter's knee would take to whisky and disreputable friends.

Terhune got Walter a pass over the railroad, so he came home every second or third Sunday. Besides, he was at home Thanksgiving and over the holidays, while Mrs. Lucas twice went to Lincoln to see him. When he came home for the long vacation at the end of the year it seemed that, after all, she had hardly been separated from him at all.

His second and third year passed in the same way. Never more than three weeks went by without her seeing him. She still looked after his clothes, darned his stockings, mended and sorted his linen, bought his underwear and neckties for him as when he had been a little child. She had to look up now, but she saw the same rosy cheeks, bright, direct blue eyes and ready laugh.

And what she especially took comfort and pride in, next to his proficiency in his studies, was his way with the girls. He was popular. All the nicest girls were his friends, and he was a friend to all of them, without any particular preference. It had been that way since he was a little fellow—the nice girls had been his friends.

The mother thought: "Some day, when he gets of that age, he will fall in love with the nicest and best and most popular girl of them all; and by and by they will be married." She remembered that she had been married three years younger; but that was different. Meantime it was fine that these nice girls liked him so frankly and that he liked them in kind.

III

IT WAS in December of Walter's fourth year at Lincoln that May Dixon, daughter of Warrensville's mayor, left the university abruptly and came home. The gossips had a rumor that she had been expelled or had fallen into some sort of scandal. The rumor found quick ground because of the sensation of four years before in which she had been the chief figure.

Major Dixon, the mayor, had a swelling chest, a black mustache and imperial, a military air. His slouch hat was always worn a little on one side. Whisky had not improved a naturally bad temper.

Four years before, May, then seventeen, had gone to the baseball game at Hurley with young Gallup, who called himself city editor of the Democrat and was not known in good society. Other young people in groups and couples had gone to the ball game; but May Dixon and Gallup kept apart. An hour after the train left Major Dixon learned that they had gone together. He drove the seventeen miles to Hurley in an hour and a half, and looked over the ball grounds without finding the two he sought. A little later he did find them eating ice cream in a shabby restaurant. He horsewhipped Gallup on the spot, breaking the young man's arm and a good deal of china, and took the young lady home. He also announced that he would shoot Gallup on sight if he returned to Warrensville. The young man did not return. Gossip is busy in a place like Warrensville. The girl was different thereafter. She held herself aloof, with a high head. Her sudden departure from the university brought the old affair to life, for it was remembered that Gallup was in Lincoln, connected with a weekly sheet that called itself a society journal, but which every one knew for a mere blackmailing agency. It was insisted that he had something to do with May's coming home.

—THE GIRL SAID LOW: "I'VE BEEN TELLING YOUR MOTHER, WALTER"

Mrs. Lucas on her way back to Terhune's office after lunch saw the girl driving a span of fine bays to a new victoria. A negro boy in livery, the first to be seen in Warrensville, sat beside her. The display and extravagance and debts of Major Dixon someway lent probability to gossip about his daughter. The girl herself was tall, slim, with large dark eyes, black hair and a clear, colorless skin. She was certainly handsome; but it was the way she held herself that kept Mrs. Lucas' startled attention. There was something royal in the pride of the slender, erect figure, and the dark eyes that looked calmly forth without seeing any one. She swung the mettlesome horses up to the curb in front of the post-office, and waited while the boy skipped inside. Everybody on the street was aware of her. Men and women looked up at her as she sat motionless. Those who knew her attempted to catch her eye and bow. But she neither saw them nor appeared to avoid seeing them. The calm eyes simply looked afar. There was no motion of her lips or eyelids. The boy appeared and skipped into the victoria. She spoke to the horses and they dashed away.

Little, gentle Mrs. Lucas, loitering in the doorway, drew a long breath. It was superb; but to the widow's modest imagination it was an awful kind of superbness. She went upstairs to the office with the sense that she was a very humble person, for which she was most thankful.

The next day some one showed Mrs. Terhune this item in the blackmailing paper at Lincoln:

> The fair daughter of the mayor of one of the fairest cities in Nebraska left the university suddenly last week. It is whispered that the young lady's tender effusions to an old flame have something to do with the case. More anon.

The day after Walter came home unannounced. He explained that the holidays were at hand, and there was nothing in the courses for the intervening week that interested him. He arrived in the evening, and in the morning went off with Terhune. They spent the forenoon together. The boy came in at noon and went to the midday dinner with his mother; but directly afterward went away. Terhune took Mrs. Lucas home with him to supper. He said Walter had told him that he was going to take supper with a friend and that he would come to the Terhunes' for his mother in the evening. Mrs. Lucas rather wondered at this, but she supposed Walter was so big a boy now that she could not expect him to account to her for all his time.

They were in the sitting-room after supper. Terhune had looked once or twice at the clock. He had an appointment for half-past seven, he said.

It was nearly that when the doorbell rang. The heavy-footed maid went to open the door, and in a moment May Dixon swept in.

She wore a long black cloth cloak and was neatly gloved. As she came swiftly to the arched doorway and halted, one foot a little advanced, the black plume on her hat swayed forward and trembled upright. Without any greeting she spoke at once to Terhune:

"Gallup is here."

Terhune had arisen and stepped toward her.

"Yes. I know that," he said. He paused a moment, looking at her, and added calmly, "Walter is here, too, and has gone out to find him."

The girl's face contracted with pain. "No! Not Walter!" she cried. "You agreed to have Walter keep away from him!" she accused.

"If I could," Terhune corrected gently. He cleared his throat. "It was necessary to take care of your father; to keep him from running across Gallup or knowing he was in town, so I put in the afternoon talking business with him and we have an engagement for this evening, while Walter—it was what Walter insisted upon. And finally, I didn't see that any one had any right to take the case out of his hands—since you had given him the right to go."

"No!" she declared.

"When I talked against it—proposed to have Gallup arrested or to send somebody else to run him out of town—Walter only smiled. He said: 'Her father cannot help her in this. If Aunt Janet had stood in her place before you were married would you have let anybody else take it up?'" The plain, middle-aged lawyer concluded gravely: "After that I had nothing more to say, for no one has any business to deny a man's right to protect the woman he loves—not even the woman herself."

The girl's lip trembled and the lawyer's face suddenly blurred before her straining eyes. "I am very unfortunate, Mr. Terhune," she murmured.

"Not at all! Not at all!" he encouraged. "This is coming out all right. You stay right here, now. Don't mix things up. You stay right here and Gallup will be quietly out of town in an hour. Janet will take care of you."

The girl turned with a flowing motion and bowed. "I hope you will forgive me, Mrs. Terhune," she said humbly; and then for the first time she was aware of Mrs. Lucas. She started a little and turned red, looking at the widow with parted lips.

"I must keep my engagement now," said Terhune. "You stay right here until you're sent for."

As he went out the girl crossed the room and took the chair beside Walter's mother, bending toward her.

"Will you let me tell you, Mrs. Lucas?" she pleaded.

The mother sat stunned. Her whole world, which consisted of her son whom she still imagined as half a child under her wing, had been overturned at a stroke. As it glimmered upon her that this beautiful and imperious creature stood in such a relation to Walter, it seemed as impossible as though her son had abruptly presented her with a Valkyrie for a daughter-in-law. And behind all that lay the shadow of something dubious, scandalous, and Major Dixon with his strut and extravagance.

Now the girl stooped toward her with a woman's plea, suddenly humble and sweet. The elder woman felt the younger's compelling beauty. No one could deny her royalty.

"I didn't know," Mrs. Lucas murmured confusedly.

"No," said the girl. "It came about almost of a sudden. Perhaps Walter himself was—surprised." Her beautiful lips parted in a small smile; the pink flushed over her face again. "I think I had been unfortunate, Mrs. Lucas. Going to the ball game with Gallup was a foolish, headstrong, schoolgirl's scrape. And what happened afterward——" She paused and shook her head mournfully. "I think no one has any right, not even a father, to make a girl's name the subject of talk. It was his honor that he was zealous about, not mine. That affair and the gossip made a great difference with me. It was a sort of horror—all the more, I suppose, because I found the man a poor specimen. Gallup has been in Lincoln lately. He's a thing of the gutter now. He has three or four schoolgirl letters of mine and he began to annoy me. Of course, he has a grudge on account of what my father did, and he's the sort to take it out of me. Besides, he wanted money. I lived in terror of him because anything that would make talk was a nightmare to me. Twice I gave him money for the letters—what little I had. I suppose I lost my head to do that, for I never got the letters. But I had no one to go to—least of all my father, for his way would have been to use a horsewhip again, or a pistol, and that would have been the worst of all. What terrorized me was the idea of scandal—the letters being printed in that awful paper, perhaps with the dates changed, or Gallup's attacking my father. I was quite desperate, and without any one to turn to." She stopped in the rapid, nervous narrative, looking into the widow's eyes. Her voice dropped to a softer tone.

"Of course, I had known Walter a long time, but only in a casual way. One evening six weeks ago we were all going to the Wednesday evening concert. I was walking alone. Gallup appeared, stepped up and spoke to me, stopping me on the street before the others as though we were friends. I knew it was done to frighten me and let the others see; but I was frightened. As it happened, Walter and two or three other young men were coming along behind me. He told me afterward that he knew something was wrong; so he stepped up at once and spoke to me as though we had not seen each other for some time. In that way, without any disturbance, I was able to turn away and walk off with him, leaving Gallup. Then, after the concert, he fell in with me as by accident and walked home with me. Gallup was not mentioned, but I knew that Walter knew, and it seemed to me the first time any one had helped me. After that Walter called on me and we went to several places together. One evening I told him about Gallup."

Her voice dropped still lower, as though she could whisper it to the mother. "You—you know that every one must trust him. He is so sure and sweet. He went to Gallup then. I don't know what happened; but I know there was a collision between them. Walter came back to me with his hand bound in a handkerchief, and told me he thought Gallup would never trouble me any more. I loved him very much. He was very popular. Everything about him had been clear and sweet like himself; but it seems to me that it must always have been me, the lonely, troubled girl, whom he would love at last."

Mrs. Lucas looked at her with dim eyes—at this girl whose beauty and bearing made an atmosphere; and she already felt, too, that this had been inevitable, instead of the "nice," popular girl of her fancy.

Together they heard his step on the porch. May sprang up; but restrained herself from running forward. She stood erect, eager, waiting.

When he entered the room his mother saw, as for the first time, his bulk and thews, and the closely-shaven growth of blond beard on his cheeks. He went at once to the girl.

"Uncle Bob told me you were here," he said. Standing beside her looking down, smiling a little, he added: "There's no trouble. Gallup has taken the way-freight out of town. It's all right."

"Aa-h!" She made the exclamation a low, happy, singing sound. The mother saw the two, each looking at the other, making a world of their own, in which even she was a stranger. Still looking at him, the girl said low, with a trembling smile, "I've been telling your mother, Walter."

He looked over at the mother with love, but did not leave the girl. "Well, mother," he said—then dropped his hand on May's shoulder with a smiling glance at his mother and back at his sweetheart, as though he offered the mother the girl's loveliness—"I suppose there's nothing more to say."

Mrs. Lucas thought something like this: "When he was a babe and lay in my arm, and when he came out of the operation at the hospital, and when I worked and saved for him, it seemed to me that he was all my own. But all the time I was only bringing him to her."

When the young ones had gone, Walter taking May home, the two women, left alone, were silent for a moment.

"She is very beautiful and sweet," said Mrs. Lucas absently.

"She seems much in love with him," Mrs. Terhune admitted.

Mrs. Lucas looked around at her friend. "We don't keep them long."

The younger mother said nothing, but she felt a sudden hunger to get her own child in her arms and hold her tight.

"I suppose our mothers felt that way, too, and our husbands' mothers," said Mrs. Lucas. She mused a moment. The power of the girl's beauty came back to her. She looked around at her friend again. "Well—if they are married and happy——" She did not try to say any more, but sat musing while her aroused heart dreamed forward to the picture of her son's home and rosy grandchildren.

OUR AMERICAN SNOBS

By James L. Ford

THE RELATION OF YELLOW JOURNALISM TO ITS OWN CREATION, THE FOUR HUNDRED

STUDENTS of contemporary journalism trace the enormous circulation and influence of the Planet and the wealth and power of the house of Barshfield to an important discovery made by Simon, the second in the royal line and the father of David, the present ruler. Therefore I shall not disdain to give credit to whom it is due, even though I no longer have a seat at David Barshfield's council table; and I hereby acknowledge that if it had not been for the light shed upon the subject of modern society by my still venerated chief, these pages would not have been illumined by the great, shining light of the knowledge which I owe to him, and the true story of the relation which yellow journalism bears to the Four Hundred would perhaps have remained a sealed book to all mankind for centuries to come.

I was reminded of these facts by a discussion which raged at the Sunday morning breakfast-table in regard to the exact social position of Mrs. John Smith, into which I foolishly permitted myself to be drawn; wondering, the while, how the name of a woman as well bred and well born and charming as Mrs. Smith ever happened to stray into the conversation at Mrs. Catnip's table. The boarders paid but scant heed to my well chosen and entirely truthful summing up of Mrs. Smith's social position, and a moment later the subject was disposed of by Mrs. Taffeta, who said: "I don't say but what Mrs. Smith's a nice enough woman in her way, but there hain't no style to her; you never hear of her goin' nowhere nor hevin' parties to the theatre. The fact on it is, she's not with the Four Hundred folks because she ain't in their class."

And these words having been uttered, the jaws of our oracle closed with a sharp snap and we knew that to reopen the subject at that session would be to question the authority which has always found its fullest recognition at Rebecca Catnip's table.

It was with this conversation fresh in my mind that I seated myself in my easy-chair that evening and permitted my memory to carry me back to the day when that greatest of yellow journalists, the third of the great Park Row dynasty of Barshfield, remarked to me in careless confidence as he lit a gold-tipped cigarette: "I suppose you know that it was to my father (meaning Simon, the second owner of the Planet) that we owe that most valuable of Park Row institutions, the Four Hundred. Most people believe that the honor belongs to Mr. Ward McAllister, the leader of the rather bizarre society of his generation; but he only let fall a chance remark, while my father, seeing at once the commercial value that lay behind his words, did not rest until the idea had taken permanent and practical shape. He had been educated abroad and had always felt that a generally recognized aristocracy was one of the greatest needs of the newspaper business. I remember also that about this time the growing importance of wood pulp had taken a strong hold on his mind, so that the moment his eye fell upon the McAllister interview he rose excitedly from his chair and almost shouted: 'Wood pulp and the Four Hundred! The problem of the cheap newspaper is solved at last, and your future, my boy, is assured from this very moment.'

"Then he sent for Allerton, his business manager, and showed him what McAllister had said. Allerton read it from beginning to end and blurted out: 'Well, what the deuce is there in that?'

"'Circulation!' said the old man; and the very next day he called a meeting of the business managers of the leading newspapers and convinced them that if they would consent to work together they could create an aristocracy which would appeal to the practical American mind as well as to the snobbery which exists, often a mere undeveloped kernel, in almost every human breast. It was lucky for us that McAllister put the number at four hundred, as four thousand would have been too many for exclusiveness, and forty too few for the press to juggle with. People could keep tab on forty aristocrats so closely that it would have been as difficult for a newspaper to add a new one to the list as for a yellow French paper to create a forty-first immortal for the Academy. With four hundred, however, we can slip in a new aristocrat whenever we need a new feature for the Sunday supplement or desire to bestow some graceful reward for services rendered."

"But can you create an American aristocrat?" I gasped, for at that time I was new to Park Row and the simplest things seemed wonderful to me.

"And why not?" rejoined Barshfield with his French shoulder-shrug. "The proportion of newspaper-made aristocrats in the Four Hundred is about that of modern peers, meaning those whose titles do not antedate the Georges, in the House of Lords, and of Napoleonic counts and barons in the nobility of France. It is only because of the incredible swiftness of the pace with which we live here compared with that of the older countries that a dozen years of newspaper work equals in result about a century of growth in Europe. When a grateful political party in England raises any one to the peerage, it is customary to explain that it is as a reward for 'eminent services rendered to his country,' but, as no man is ever thus honored unless he be the possessor of a large fortune, the phrase ought to read 'for eminent services rendered to himself.' Essentially a commercial and hard-headed people, the English have a rooted antipathy to a ragged and barefooted peerage such as would easily pass muster in the sunnier climes. We of this country are also practical and hard-headed, but we are a more imaginative people than the English, and so it happens that our Four Hundred, although founded on the visible rock of prodigious wealth and carried on with tremendous splurge and réclame, nevertheless consists largely of people who are actually in a state of destitution. As children of our own, we of the press keep up their popular reputation by representing them as wealthy and luxurious. Therefore it behooves the press to recognize these poverty-stricken Park Row aristocrats as its own legitimate offspring and support them, in print at least, in a manner calculated to sustain their reputation as persons of wealth and luxurious habits."

"But I thought they were wealthy and luxurious—these people of the society column!" I exclaimed.

"So they are—in the newspapers," replied the proprietor of the Planet, "and some of them have money in their own right as well. The rule of the office is, however, that their lives, their belongings, their amusements shall always be painted in glowing colors. You may have noticed in our Sunday paper not long ago an article called Swaddling Clothes of Millionaire Children, which told how infants belonging to the wealthiest families were decked out in the most costly apparel and never went into the street without real lace caps worth hundreds of dollars apiece? I've no doubt that thousands of the people to whom I owe my fortune and income read that article with distended eyes, although, as a matter of fact, it is a lie from beginning to end. Everybody who knows New York will tell you that the infant members of such families as the Vanastorbilts are done up in red flannel when they go out to take the air, and that the further down you get in the social scale the more style is put on by the baby. Watch the eviction of some poor family from a tenement house and you'll find out what I mean. First you'll see the family and a few neighbors bringing out a wretched collection of broken tables, three-legged chairs and battered pots and pans; then, at the tail-end of the procession, will come the mother wheeling a perambulator with a canopy top-lined with red silk, and the baby sitting in it arrayed like Solomon in all his glory. That baby will be sure to have a lace cap, no matter whether the family have a real meal or not. If we wanted to put that baby in the Four Hundred (and there's no telling when it might be policy to do so) his photograph—lace cap, perambulator and all—would make a much better showing in the middle of a page than that of the average kid that you see on Fifth Avenue."

"How does the press put people in the Four Hundred?" I inquired.

"Some get in by being run as 'freak features' in the Sunday paper, others through the broad gateway marked 'among those present,' and a great many by being written up as 'new cotillon leaders.' Of course, this newspaper renown will no more give one the entrée to the really good houses than a title bestowed by the Second French Empire carried with it admission to the exclusive circles of the Faubourg St. Germain. However, it does as much for a man as Louis Napoleon did when he turned a contractor into a nobleman; he simply put him in 'among those present,' and let him shift for himself."

This conversation took place at a time when I knew but little of the real forces of the modern press, or "yellow journalism," as it is called, and I remember that when I withdrew from the Presence and went out from the audience chamber it was with the feeling that the words which I had been privileged to hear as they fell from the inspired lips of David, third of the royal Park Row dynasty of Barshfield, contained a kernel of wisdom which might, under my fostering care, grow into a mighty tree of philosophy and knowledge. A few days later a chance discovery of minor importance helped to confirm a great deal that my employer had said and started me on the train of serious thought that has culminated in this important contribution to contemporary sociology.

Up to this time I had been innocent enough to believe that the loud talking which so often floats from opera and theatre boxes occupied by persons vaguely defined as "society people" and the explosions of vulgar laughter that cause so much craning of necks in the Nickel-Plush and other gaudy restaurants were due merely to heedlessness on the part of the noisemakers. The scales fell from my eyes, however, one night when I was seated in my aisle seat at a local theatre, brooding over the words of my employer, and was awakened from my reverie by the arrival of an organized band of social pushers who were at that time one of the minor nuisances of the town. Six of them marched into the row of seats behind me and as many more tramped noisily, and without a word of apology to the lady who was with me and who rose to let them pass, into the seats beyond ours. They had scarcely seated themselves when the leading climber, who sat directly behind me, began the work of advertising their presence to the rest of the audience by bawling out: "There's Mrs. Waddy Vanastorbilt in that upper box!"

"No," screamed the young woman next him, "that's not Mrs. Waddy Vanastorbilt!"

"Yes," bellowed the pusher next to her, "it is Mrs. Waddy Vanastorbilt. And there's Petey Titcomb in the back of the box. That proves it! He, he, he!"

So the cry was taken up and carried along by each in turn until there was not a soul in the lower part of the house who had not been told that each and every one of this little band of climbers was on pleasantly familiar terms with the famous social leader, Mrs. Waddy Vanastorbilt.

This was annoying enough, but there is a serious side to the matter which I did not realize until I happened to go into the lobby between the acts and there heard one woman say to another: "That's an awful swell crowd that's sitting right in front of me. I do wish I could find out who they are. They came in awful late—probably from the Nickel-Plush Hotel where they'd been dining—and they're all friends of Mrs. Waddy Vanastorbilt, because they were talking about her the whole time."

"Oh, I noticed that party," said the other woman eagerly. "They're just nothing but style, too. Why, they recognized Mrs. Vanastorbilt the minute they seen her in the box. I wonder if anybody here knows who they are? Let's ask at the box-office."

I should be happy, indeed, were I able to convey to my readers an adequate idea of the tone of abject servility with which the women in the lobby spoke of the pushers whose vulgar effrontery had made such a profound impression on them. I watched them as they interrogated the man in the box-office, and was dumfounded—I knew but little of society in those days—when I saw that good-natured official hand them a bit of paper on which the names of the pushers were written, and which the parasite of the party—for even these vulgarians have parasites, just as the fleas on the dog are said to have fleas of their own—had left with him to be given to any society reporter who might happen along; and then—if I may be permitted to quote from the vernacular of the ungodly—I "dropped" to what the climbers were doing and realized with a sharp pang of mortification that a file of six of them had been climbing into society over my feet. The next morning I saw their names in the Planet society column characterized as "a group of well-known fashionables"—and behold a gateway to the kingdom of the Four Hundred that I had never even dreamed of stood open before me.

A week later I asked the same box-office official if he could give me the names of the ladies and gentlemen occupying a lower proscenium box. They were richly dressed and of distinguished appearance, and although I sat close to the box I could not hear a word that they said.

"I don't know who they are," replied the box-office man. "They didn't leave their names with me."

As for the women who had opened my eyes to this delightful form of what might be termed "social pushery," my exuberant fancy can easily paint their home-coming, profoundly impressed as they were with the exalted social station and "style" of this group of noisy climbers who "knew Mrs. Waddy Vanastorbilt." I can imagine them the next morning gathering their children about them and telling them how to behave in public places, and instructing them as to the quickest, cheapest and most admirable method of impressing an entire theatre audience with a sense of their own social importance. Annoying as it is to be compelled to sit in the very midst of such a crew as this, I cannot help feeling that my own sufferings and those of the other auditors are of but trifling consequence in comparison with the evil that may result from such an atrocious example of bad manners.

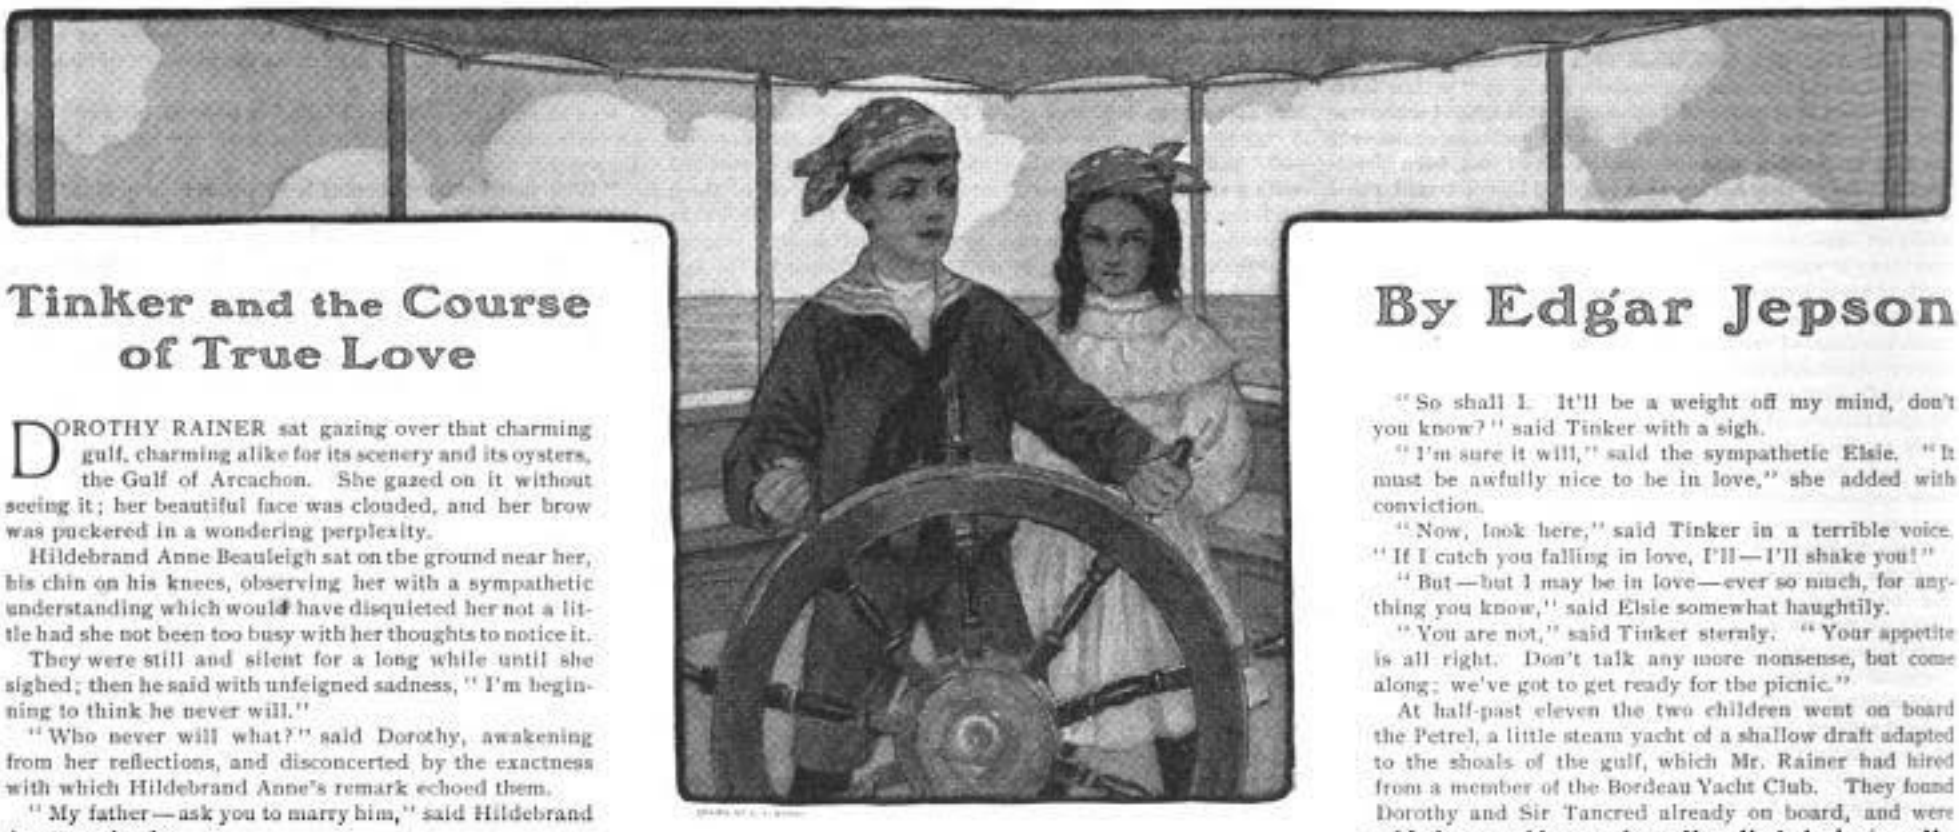
However, I have reason to be grateful to this noisy party for what I learned from them that night, and it was in recognition of their services to the cause of social science that I induced Mr. Barshfield, who was much interested in the account that I gave him of my observations, to instruct my excellent friend, William Swallowtail, the Planet's able society reporter, to mention their names as frequently as possible. And thus in the end it came to pass that they actually did climb into society over my feet.

Having now tasted of the fruit of the tree of society knowledge I pursued my investigations still further, and soon ascertained that noisy theatre-goers do not—as I had imagined in the days of my innocence—come late to the theatre because they are so intensely fashionable that they find it impossible to dine before eight. I soon discovered that it is their custom to dine late—even though they find themselves hungry at half-past six—because that enables them to attract some attention as they enter Delmonico's or the Nickel-Plush; and, if they find on arriving at the theatre that the curtain is still down, they tell the coachman to drive them around the block once or twice in order that they may have the benefit of what actors call "a good entrance." No matter how glum and silent they may be they all burst into a roar of laughter as soon as they enter the lobby, and stamp on the marble floor and beat it with their canes and umbrellas. In coming down the aisle they must keep up a merry giggling chatter, and in climbing over people into their seats be careful not to be guilty of a word or even a look of apology for the annoyance they are causing. Before taking their seats the rules of the Climbers' Union compel them to look around and salute any acquaintances who may be within half a dozen rows of them, and if they can drag in the name of some person of social prominence they must do it in tones loud enough to be heard by the doorkeeper.

One thing there was that I failed to understand and I took an early opportunity to seek information at the hands of David Barshfield.

"Was there no aristocracy here prior to the McAllister era?" I asked him one day when we were alone and he was in a reminiscent and talkative mood.

"Most assuredly there was," he replied without hesitation. "Look up the old files of my grandfather's time and of the earlier years of my father's reign and see how the Planet used to abuse it. You can see the spirit of envious hate in every one of the denunciations that made our editorial page both feared and famous in the old days. The Planet never abuses the Four Hundred now because we don't envy any man the sort of distinction that it confers (he used the proposition "we," meaning himself, as is the prerogative of Park Row royalty), in fact, the original Four Hundred consisted largely of persons who owed their position to birth, wealth and the qualities that stand for genuine social distinction. Of late years they have been gradually crowded out of sight by the various freak features, new cotillon leaders and other so-called 'smart' people that we in Park Row have created from time to time for the purpose of keeping popular interest alive, for in this country unless there is 'something doing,' as they say in aristocratic circles, the whole institution is voted slow and behind the times. At present the real upper ten are so little in print in comparison with the nobles of our own creation that the general public knows very little about them. And it would be just as foolish for us to give them precedence over the Four Hundred that we have set up ourselves as it would be for a merchant to extol a competitor's goods at the expense of his own."



"The really fine society exists then now as it did before?" I said inquiringly.

Barshfield looked at me for a moment as if he were wondering whether it would be advisable to give me as deep an insight into the affairs of the business as I desired. Then he made answer, speaking thoughtfully and with sincerity, which was something that he seldom did. "My dear boy, can't you see the absurdity of imagining that this progressive, powerful city, this metropolis of the Western Hemisphere, whose influence is helping to shape the destiny of the entire world, can offer nothing better socially than the raw products of our Sunday supplement page and society column? Do you think that the men whose fortunes are the talk of the world and whose power is felt in every money market in Europe—these men of tremendous practical achievement, of inventive genius, of far-reaching and judicious charities—do you think that they spend their leisure hours dining with monkeys or capering about in Japanese costume? Do you think that the wives of these men, who are generally their mental equals, even if their children are not, entertain one another with parlor vaudevilles in which Miss Kittie Socks charms all hearers by singing 'Oh, I'm a Little Onion in a Kidney Stew?' No, my dear boy, we ask the Planet readers to believe that, but the very moment we begin to believe it ourselves we are in imminent danger of losing half our Sunday circulation."

THE ADMIRABLE TINKER

Tinker and the Course of True Love

By Edgar Jepson

DOROTHY RAINER sat gazing over that charming gulf, charming alike for its scenery and its oysters, the Gulf of Arcachon. She gazed on it without seeing it; her beautiful face was clouded, and her brow was puckered in a wondering perplexity.

Hildebrand Anne Beauleigh sat on the ground near her, his chin on his knees, observing her with a sympathetic understanding which would have disquieted her not a little had she not been too busy with her thoughts to notice it.

They were still and silent for a long while until she sighed; then he said with unfeigned sadness, "I'm beginning to think he never will."

"Who never will what?" said Dorothy, awakening from her reflections, and disconcerted by the exactness with which Hildebrand Anne's remark echoed them.

"My father—ask you to marry him," said Hildebrand Anne succinctly.

"Tinker!" cried Dorothy faintly, and she flushed a very fine red.

"It's all very well to say 'Tinker!' like that," he said, shaking his head very wisely. "But it's much better to look at things straight, don't you know? You often get a little forrarder that way."

"You are a dreadful little boy," said Dorothy with conviction.

"Yes, yes; I'm not blind," said Tinker patiently. "But the point is that my father is ever so much in love with you, and he'll never ask you to marry him because you're too rich. I'm sure I've given him every chance," he added with a sigh.

"You have?" said Dorothy, gasping.

"Yes; I'm always seeing that no one makes a third when you and he are together—on moonlit nights and picnics, and so on, don't you know?"

Dorothy laughed in spite of her discomfort at this frank discussion of her secret. "But this is inveterate matchmaking," she said. "Why do you do it?"

"Oh, I think it would be a good thing. You both want it badly, and you'd get on awfully well together. Besides, you're neither of you as cheerful as you used to be, and I don't like it: it bothers me."

"It's very good of you to let it," said Dorothy.

"Not at all. And Elsie and I should have a settled home, too. It's very funny; but sometimes I get tired of living in hotels."

"I'm sure you do," said Dorothy with sympathy.

"Well, have you got any idea how it can be worked?"

"No!" cried Dorothy, shocked, and flushing again. "I haven't! I wouldn't have!"

"That's silly, when it would be such a good thing," said Tinker with a disapproving air. "However, I suppose I can work it myself. I generally have to, if I want anything done."

"What are you going to do?" cried Dorothy in great alarm. "Oh, I do wish I hadn't said anything, or listened to you!"

"I don't know what I'm going to do. These affairs of the heart are always difficult," said Tinker with the air of a sage who had observed many generations of unfortunate lovers.

"I won't have you do anything! I forbid it!" cried Dorothy.

"You shouldn't order your employer about," said Tinker with a smile which on any face less angelic would have been a grin. "Besides, I'm responsible, and I must do what's good for you. And after all, I sha'n't give you away, don't you know?"

"Oh, do be careful!" said Dorothy plaintively.

"I will," said Tinker; and he rose and sauntered off along the promenade.

Dorothy looked after him with mingled feelings, dread of what he might do, vexation, and a little shame that he should have so easily surprised her secret, though indeed she preferred that it should be Tinker who had discovered it to any one else in the world. Then her sure knowledge of his discretion eased her anxiety, and the consideration of his able imagination and versatile ingenuity set a new and strong hope springing up in her.

Tinker strolled along to the Café du Printemps and found his father sitting before it on the usual uncomfortable little chair before the usual white-topped table. He saw that his father's face wore very much the same expression as Dorothy's had worn before he had insisted on coming to her aid. Then he saw with something of a shock that a glass of absinthe stood on the table: things must indeed be in a bad way if his father drank absinthe at half-past ten in the morning.

However, he hid his disapproval, and sitting down on another uncomfortable chair he said gently, "What does it mean when a lady is compromised, sir?"

"It means that some accident or other has given malignant fools a chance of gossiping about her," said Sir Tancred in an unamiable tone.

"And the man has to marry her?"

"Of course he has!" snapped Sir Tancred.

"Ah," said Tinker with supreme thoughtful satisfaction.

His father looked at him for a good minute with considerable suspicion, wondering what new mischief he was hatching. But Tinker looked like a guileless seraph pondering the innocent joys of the Islands of the Blessed, to a degree which made such a suspicion a very shameful thing indeed. Partly reassured, Sir Tancred returned to his brooding: he was angry with himself because he felt helpless in an impasse. On the one hand, he could not bring himself to fly from Dorothy; on the other hand, he could not bring himself to abate his pride and ask her to marry him. She was so rich: Rainer had talked of settling five million dollars on her. He looked again at the pondering Tinker; and his helpless irritation found the natural English vent in grumbling.

"Look here," he said half querulously, half whimsically, "I told you that if you went on adding to our household I should be traveling about Europe with a caravan. You began by adopting Elsie as a sister, and I said nothing. Then you added Miss Rainer as her governess, and I warned you. Miss Rainer added her father, a millionaire; and he added a maid, a valet, two secretaries, a courier, and a private detective. All these people—I know them well—will marry; and I shall be a patriarch, traveling with my tribe. It must stop."

Tinker sighed: "We are a large household—eleven of us," he said thoughtfully. "But you might make it more compact, sir."

"More compact? How?"

"You might marry Dorothy; and then you and she could count as one."

A sudden light of exasperation brightened Sir Tancred's eyes, and he made a grab at Tinker's arm. His hand closed on empty air; Tinker was flying like the wind.

"Tinker!" roared Sir Tancred; but Tinker went round a corner at the moment at which only the T of his name could fairly be expected to have reached him. Sir Tancred ground his teeth, and then he laughed.

Tinker made a circuit, and came down to the sea where he found Elsie playing with two little English girls staying at Arcachon with their mother. At once she deserted them for him; and when he had withdrawn her to a distance he said, "I've hit on a way of getting them married."

"No! Have you? You are clever," she cried with the ungrudging admiration she always accorded him.

"Clever? It only wants a little common-sense," said Tinker with some disdain.

"I shall be glad."

"So shall I. It'll be a weight off my mind, don't you know?" said Tinker with a sigh.

"I'm sure it will," said the sympathetic Elsie. "It must be awfully nice to be in love," she added with conviction.

"Now, look here," said Tinker in a terrible voice. "If I catch you falling in love, I'll—I'll shake you!"

"But—but I may be in love—ever so much, for anything you know," said Elsie somewhat haughtily.

"You are not," said Tinker sternly. "Your appetite is all right. Don't talk any more nonsense, but come along; we've got to get ready for the picnic."

At half-past eleven the two children went on board the Petrel, a little steam yacht of a shallow draft adapted to the shoals of the gulf, which Mr. Rainer had hired from a member of the Bordeau Yacht Club. They found Dorothy and Sir Tancred already on board, and were told that a cablegram from New York had given Mr. Rainer, his secretaries and the telegraph office of Arcachon a day's work, and prevented him from coming with them. Tinker had known this fact all the morning, but he did not say so. His manner to his father showed a serene unconsciousness of any cloud upon their relations.

The Petrel was soon crossing the gulf, in an immensely important way, at her full speed of eight knots an hour. In pursuance of his policy Tinker took Elsie forward, and left Dorothy and his father to entertain one another on the quarter-deck. The two children amused themselves very well, talking to Alphonse, the steersman, and Adolphe, the engineer, thick-set, thick-witted men who combined the picturesqueness of organ-grinders with the stolidity of agriculturists; Nature had plainly intended them for the plough, and Circumstance had pitchforked them into seafaring.

An hour's steaming brought them across the gulf; they landed and made their déjeuner at a little auberge, or rather cabaret, affected by fishermen and the folk of the Landes, off gray mullet, fresh from the Bay of Biscay, grilled over a fire of pine-cones, with a second course of ring-doves roasted before it.

After their coffee Tinker suggested that they should cross over to the strip of sand which at that point separates the gulf from the bay; and the others fell in with his humor. They steamed across and landed in the yacht's dingey. Tinker insisted on taking two rugs, though both Dorothy and his father objected that the sand was quite dry enough to sit on. However, when they came to the beach of the bay Sir Tancred spread them out, and he and Dorothy sat down. The two children wandered away, and presently Elsie found herself holding Tinker's hand and running hard through the pines toward the landing-place.

In answer to Tinker's hail Alphonse fetched them aboard in the dingey; and the honest, unsuspecting mariners accepted Tinker's instructions to take them for a cruise and come back later for his father and the lady without a murmur. But no sooner was the Petrel under way than he strode to the middle of the quarter-deck, folded his arms, scowled darkly in the direction of his father and Dorothy, so heedless of their plight, and growled in his hoarsest, most piratical voice:

"Marooned! Marooned!"

Slowly he paced the deck, with arms still folded, casting the piercing glances of a bird of prey across the waters; then of a sudden he roared, once more with the true piratical hoarseness, "All hands on deck to splice the main-brace!"

Alphonse and Adolphe did not understand his nautical English; but when Elsie came from the cabin with a bottle of cognac and two glasses their slow, wide grins showed a perfect comprehension. Tinker gave them the cognac and took the wheel. Then he became absorbed in steering and sternly rejected all further consideration of his gift; he would have neither hand nor part in hocussing French agriculturists posing as mariners.

But for all his absorption in his steering and his care to look past them as they sat in more than fraternal affection on the deck with the bottle between them, it was somehow forced on him, probably by the noise they made, that they proceeded from a gentle cheerfulness through a wild and songful hilarity, broken by interludes in which each described to the other with eloquent enthusiasm the charms of the lass who loved him best, to a tearful melancholy, from which they were rapt away into a sodden and stertorous slumber.

At the third snore he turned to Elsie, who sat near him looking rather scared by the changing humors of the agricultural mariners, and said with a sardonic and ferocious smile, "The ship is ours."

Forthwith they divested themselves of the hats of civilization, and tied the professional red handkerchief round their heads; then he gave her the wheel, and going to the cabin, came back with a black flag neatly embroidered in white with a skull and cross-bones, Dorothy's work, and sternly bade an imaginary quartermaster run up the Jolly Roger. Then as quartermaster he ran up that emblem of his dreadful trade himself; became captain once more, and with folded arms and corrugated brow surveyed it gloomily. Then he went down to the engine-room, put the yacht on half-speed and as well as he could stoked the fires.

For the next three hours the Petrel forgot all the innocent traditions of her youth as a pleasure-boat, and traversed the Gulf of Arcachon a shameless, ravening pirate, while Captain Hildebrand, the Scourge of the Spanish Main, issued curt, sanguinary orders to an imaginary but as blood-dyed a gang of scoundrels as ever scuttled an Indiaman. The Jolly Roger and three or four blank shots from the little signal gun drove three panic-stricken fishing-boats from their fishing-ground as fast as oars and sails could carry them, to spread abroad a legend of piracy in the gulf which would last a generation.

It was nearly sunset before Captain Hildebrand returned to the serious consideration of his business as Cupid's ally. Then he set the Petrel going dead slow, ran her gently on to a sand-bank, and let fall the anchor which was hanging from her bows. This done, again a pirate, he looked at the recumbent and still stertorous Alphonse and Adolphe with cold, cruel eyes, and said, "It's time these lubbers walked the plank."

"Ay, ay, sir!" said Elsie cheerfully; and then she added in a doubtful voice, "but won't the poor men get drowned?"

"Not in four feet of water," said Captain Hildebrand; and he set briskly about the preparations for the fell deed. With Elsie's help he brought a plank to the gangway; and then, each taking him by an arm, they dragged the grunting Adolphe slowly down the deck, and arranged him on the plank. With a capstan-bar and many a hearty "Yo! heave oh!" they levered the plank out over the side till Adolphe's weight tilted it up, and he soused into the water.

For a moment he disappeared, then he rose spluttering and choking, sank again, found his footing, and stood up roaring like a flabbergasted bull. Captain Hildebrand lay quietly down on the deck and writhed and kicked in spasms of racking mirth; but his trusty lieutenant, after laughing a while, looked grave and said, "The poor man will catch cold."

"I have no sympathy with drunkards," said Captain Hildebrand with cold severity; but he rose, and going forward, by kicking Alphonse hard and freely in the ribs, roused him from his dream of the lass who loved a sailor, and said, "Adolphe has fallen overboard."

It took some time for the information to penetrate Alphonse's skull. When it did, he was all vivid alertness, staggered swiftly aft to the gangway, and in rather less than five seconds, with no conspicuous agility, had precipitated himself into Adolphe's arms. They rose clinging to one another, and both roared like bulls, while the shrieking Tinker danced lightly round the deck.

Presently he recovered enough to throw them a rope, and they climbed aboard: no difficult feat, seeing that the deck was not two feet above their heads. Before they thought of the yacht they went to the forecastle and changed their wet clothes, while the dusk deepened. Tinker went to the galley and made tea. He had brought it to the cabin, and he and Elsie were making a well-earned and hearty meal, and discoursing with gusto of their blood-dyed career during the afternoon, when Alphonse, very sad and glum, came and told them that the yacht was aground, and Adolphe was getting up full steam to get her off.

In half an hour he heard the rattle of the propeller, and coming on deck said that he would go to the bows while Alphonse took the wheel and Adolphe worked the engines.

He went right forward and peered over into the darkness. Adolphe set the engines going full speed, reversed, and Tinker cried, "She's moving!"

He saw the anchor chain slowly tauten, then the Petrel moved no more. The propeller thrashed away, but to no purpose, and to his great joy he was sure that the anchor held her. However, he cheered on the crew to persevere, and for nearly half an hour the propeller thrashed away. Then they gave it up, sat down gloomily on the hatch of the engine-room and lighted their pipes. Tinker and Elsie went back to the cabin, rolled themselves in rugs, and were soon enjoying the innocent sleep of childhood.

It was twelve o'clock when Tinker awoke, and at once he went on deck and found that Alphonse, by way of keeping watch, had gone comfortably to sleep in the bows, while Adolphe snored from the forecastle. He kicked Alphonse awake, and said, "Don't you think you could get her off if you hauled up the anchor?"

For a minute or two Alphonse turned the idea hazily over in some rustic arbor in his skull; then with a hasty exclamation he ran to the side and saw dimly the taut anchor chain. He blundered below, lugged Adolphe out of his berth and on deck, and for five excited minutes they explained to each other that the anchor was embedded in the sand-bank, and that it was that held the Petrel. Then soberly and slowly they got to work on the capstan and hauled it up. A dozen turns of the propeller drew the Petrel off the bank into deep water. In three minutes they had her about and steaming off toward the marooned, while Tinker in the galley was heating water for coffee and making soup.

In the meanwhile Dorothy and Sir Tancred, ignorant of their plight, had spent a delightful afternoon, exploring with a never-tiring interest one another's souls. For a long while she chided him gently for his aimless manner of living; and he defended himself with a half-mocking sadness. At about sunset they rose reluctantly, sighed with one accord that the pleasant hours were over, looked at one another with sudden questioning eyes at the sound of the sighs, and looked quickly away. They walked slowly, on feet reluctant to leave pleasant places, through the pines, silent save that twice Sir Tancred sent his voice ringing among the trees in a call to Tinker. They came to the landing-place to find an empty sea, and looked at one another blankly.

"The children must have persuaded the men to take them for a cruise," said Sir Tancred.

"But they're late coming back," said Dorothy.

For a while their eyes explored the corners and recesses of the gulf within sight, but found no Petrel; then Sir Tancred said, "Well, we must wait;" and spread a rug for her at the foot of a tree. He paced up and down before her, keeping an eye over the water and talking to her.

The dusk deepened and deepened, and at last it was quite dark.

"We're in a fix," said Sir Tancred uneasily. "Of course, if we stay here they will come for us sooner or later, but goodness knows when. If we set out to walk to civilization we shall doubtless in time strike it somewhere, but goodness knows where."

"If we went along this strip and turned eastward at the end of it, shouldn't we come to the railway?" said Dorothy.

"I don't know that we should. We should get into the Landes, and they're by way of being trackless. Anyhow, it would mean walking for hours; and it is less exhausting for you to sit here. The Petrel must turn up sooner or later."

Remembering her talk with Tinker in the morning Dorothy believed that it would be later, much later; but as she could hardly unfold her reasons for the belief she said nothing.

For a long while they were silent. Listening to the faint thunder of the bay behind them, the lapping of the water at their feet, and the stirring of the pines, she filled slowly with a sense of their aloofness from the world and a perfect content in being out of it, alone with him. For his part, Sir Tancred was ill at ease: he foresaw that unless the Petrel came soon a lot of annoying gossip might spring from their accident, and he was distressed on her account. On the other hand, he, too, found himself enjoying being alone with her, out of the world.

At last she said softly: "I feel as though we were on a desolate, far-away island."

"I wish to goodness we were!" he cried with a fervor which thrilled her.

"You'd find it very dull," she said with a faint, uncertain laugh.

"Not with you," he said quietly. She was silent; and he took another turn up and down before he said, half to himself, "It would simplify things so; we should be equal."

"Equal?"

"Oh, not from the personal point of view!" he said quickly. "You'd always be worth a hundred of me. But on a desolate island money wouldn't count."

"Oh, money!" she said with a faint disdain. "What has money to do with anything?"

He sighed and continued his pacing.

"Money is always an obstacle," he said presently; "either there's too little of it, and that's an obstacle; or there's too much of it, and that's an obstacle."

"I don't think Papa would agree with you about too much money," said Dorothy.

"I'm wondering what he'll say if we don't turn up before morning," said Sir Tancred gloomily.

"I suppose he'll say that it was an unfortunate accident."

"Yes; but then I ought to have protected you against unfortunate accidents. I'm afraid there'll be a lot of gossip."

"Well, it wasn't your fault," said Dorothy carelessly.

Sir Tancred grew more and more unhappy. His watch told him that it was nearly ten o'clock, and there was no sign of the Petrel. Moreover, the sense of their aloofness from the world had taken a firmer hold on him, and it drew him and Dorothy nearer and nearer together. The feeling that the world, of which her money had grown the symbol, would again come between them grew more and more intolerable.

At last it grew too strong for him, and he stopped before her and said in a voice he could not keep firm, "About that wasted life of mine, Dorothy? Do you think you could do anything with it?"

Dorothy gasped. "I might—I might try," she said in a whisper.

He stooped down, picked her up, and kissed her. Then with a profound sigh of relief and content he sat down beside her, drew her to him, and leaned back against the tree. Dorothy was crying softly.

They were far away from the world; and for them time stood still. They did not see the approaching lights of the Petrel or hear the throb of her screw; only the roaring hail of Alphonse awoke them from their dream.

When they came on board the observant Tinker saw the flush which came and went in Dorothy's cheeks, and the new light in his father's eyes; he saw her genuine surprise at finding herself so hungry; he observed that his father was quite careless in his inquiries about the cause of the Petrel's long absence; and his angel face was wreathed with the contented smile of the truly meritorious.

After supper his father went on deck to watch the steering of the yacht; Elsie fell asleep, and Dorothy sat lost in a dream.

"Is it all right?" said Tinker softly.

"I don't know what you mean. You're a horrid, scheming little boy," said Dorothy with shameless ingratitude.

"Yes; but is it all right?" said Tinker.

"I sha'n't let you scheme like that when—when I'm your mother," said Dorothy with virtuous severity, and she blushed.

"So it is all right," said Tinker; and he chuckled.

"ABOUT THAT WASTED LIFE OF MINE, DOROTHY?"

A Senator of the Old Republic

By David Graham Phillips

A MAN WHOSE ENTRANCE INTO PUBLIC LIFE WAS WORTHY OF HIS EXIT

HALF a dozen New Yorkers were seated one evening in the fall of 1881 round a table in the dining-room of the best—a pretty poor best—hotel at Fargo, then a frontier village of Dakota Territory. They were "opening wine" in celebration of something of which they talked loudly, jubilantly—and with careless tongues. The rest of the dining-room soon gathered that the gayety was the result of an inspection tour from which they had just returned. They had been promised the lease of a vast and rich part of the public domain. Before they saw it they knew it was a "good thing." Now they knew that it was a prize enormously greater than any one had dreamed, the potentiality of a huge fortune for each of them.

At a table in the corner sat a small, stern-looking man with iron-gray hair and military mustache—forehead and eyes and jaw a notable exhibit of strength of intellect and character. The noisy New Yorkers did not observe him, and he was evidently trying not to observe them. He strove to shut his ears against their vulgar boasting, until——

One of them spoke two words. The stern man, as small of stature as a boy—or a Napoleon—started and stared at the unobserving group in amazement. From that time forth his show of inattention was pretense.

Two Words that Enriched a Nation

THE small, stern man was George Graham Vest, a new Senator in Congress from Missouri. The two words that had set him to listening were "Yellowstone Park!"

Taking advantage of the ignorance in the settled parts of the United States as to the far West, this ring of New Yorkers had persuaded a complaisant official of the Department of the Interior to help them obtain quietly from the Government a practically perpetual lease of the nation's magnificent park—five thousand five hundred square miles of invaluable property. For a nominal sum the Yellowstone Park was to be turned over to these few private persons and they were to have a free hand in exploiting it for their private benefit.

Senator Vest had come to Fargo to say the last good-by to a dying friend. It was by mere chance that he was in the dining-room—but the whole incident was a chapter of accidents.

As soon as Congress assembled Mr. Vest rose to make his first important appearance in the national arena, to render his first important service to the nation. And as every year adds to the value of the Yellowstone Park, so every year adds to the value of that initial public service.

He demanded the documents in relation to "the proposed lease of Yellowstone Park." Those Senators who knew were in consternation; those who did not know were astounded, incredulous. But the resolution was passed and it drew the documents from their hiding-place in the Interior Department, and there followed a stormy outburst of public indignation. The ringsters wondered how the thing had leaked out. One of them, watching the Senatorial storm from the Senate galleries, saw the small, stern figure, recognized it, and hastened to tell his fellows what mischief a few bottles of champagne and a little premature crowing in an out-of-the-way corner of the wilderness had done them and their schemes and their fortunes.

Senator Vest's victory was easy, but none the less splendid. It showed the country the character which has ever since been conspicuous—alert, keen, courageous, skillful, incorruptible. By going to the ringsters he would have made a fortune. By going for the ringsters he made another kind of fortune. And he has been industriously adding to it ever since.

Such was his first appearance and first service. Now for his last—the two admirably and completely express a national career of nearly a quarter of a century.

One bitterly cold day in the present winter—it was in January—the Senate was in animated, in almost hysterical session. The leaderless and planless and helpless Democratic minority lounged listless and feeble at the desks to the right—all except one man. But some tremendous force was agitating, was terrorizing the Republican majority. It is an overwhelming, a united majority. Yet dread, dismay, panic looked from the eyes of its leaders.

What had dismayed, what was dismaying, these habitually calm and self-poised leaders of an immovable majority? What had unnerved and affrighted this assembly of lions?

A mouse, apparently.

Among the minority, facing the unnerved lions, stood, or rather was propped, a mere mite of a human being. His body was so small and so shrunk that his head was scarce a foot and a half above the level of his desk. His black clothes hung in bags upon his wasted body and it seemed to be able to stand only because it was wedged between chair and desk.

A splendid brow adorned with scant, white hair; a skin of waxen pallor; eyes deep-hid in dark sockets and beneath lids that seemed to have risen for the last time; a snow-white mustache shading a mouth that seemed set in the rigor of death. And a few feet behind the propped figure stood a watchful attendant, ready to catch it should it become loosened from its proppings.

Such was the astounding spectacle which the galleries watched with amazement. The lions were gazing as if fascinated, and their looks concentrated upon this strange and corpselike apparition of insignificance.

The Right Man for the Right Moment

THE figure was speaking—a thin, clear, high voice. There was power in that voice, there was something relentless and supremely dangerous in its ominous calmness and evenness. And each word it sent with the deliberation of the trained marksman into the ranks of the majority caused a quiver or a flush. How was it possible for this one man, standing in the grave itself, to produce such an effect upon these men of might? Why were they shrinking in terror before this incarnation of helplessness?

The power of simple truth, enforced in just the right way, at just the right moment by a master mind.

Coal was twenty, twenty-five, thirty dollars a ton—and scarce, and two-thirds waste even at that appalling price. Coal, the necessity of all, had become an extravagant luxury for the rich. The Coal Trust and the Union had been forced to an armistice; coal was mining again, and should have been cheap. But the controllers of coal, banded in a monopoly and secure behind a tariff wall which made importation impossible, were holding up the helpless consumers and were robbing them pitilessly. And it was winter.

Senator Vest had spent a month in arming himself for this, his last fight. He had waited until precisely the right moment should arrive—the moment when one plus justice would be an overwhelming majority. The Republican leaders faced an impossible dilemma. From the people rose ever higher and fiercer the demand, "Take the duty off coal! Wrench the fingers of the strangler from our throats!" But to take off that duty would be to confess that the tariff did foster monopoly, did cause extortionate prices; and that confession would mean the all-powerful political agents of "the interests" giving themselves the lie direct; would make it impossible consistently to refuse to revise all tariff schedules on trust-controlled articles.

Senator Aldrich had decided that it would be fatal for "the interests" to permit the door to be opened so much as a crack for tariff revision. He had issued orders that the coal tariff must not be touched, that any and every attack upon it must be repulsed at whatever cost. He had resolved to brave public sentiment and take chances on a rising thermometer. Senator Vest had resolved that that tariff should be repealed. On the one side Senator Aldrich, the unyielding, backed by his robust, able, resourceful, oratorical paladins and his majority. On the other side the one man—no, not a man. Just an intellect—for from the chin down there was death. Just an intellect—and a voice. A fiercer battle was never fought in legislative hall. A stranger, a more thrilling exhibition of power, sheer intellectual power, was never given—not even when Richelieu, cast down and dying, confounded the courtiers by wrenching from his king the reins of power which the king had fancied he could recover because Richelieu's hands were chilling in death.

The Fight for Free Coal

SENATOR VEST demanded the repeal of the duty on coal. His speech was calm and simple, a passionless arraying of unanswerable facts—the monopoly, the tariff, licensed extortion, the suffering of the people. Aldrich replied—a nervous, agitated evasion. The weird figure he was addressing seemed to cast a spell over him, taking the glibness from his tongue, the plausibility from his protestations.

Senator Vest renewed his demand with more merciless facts and arguments. Hoar replied—a quavering plea that the Senate hadn't the Constitutional right to originate such a measure. The weird figure of life-in-death which he faced as he talked affected him as it had affected Senator Aldrich.

The voice from the propped-up figure demolished the plea of technicality and renewed the demand—tranquil, logical, with rapier steadfastly aimed at the craven and quaking heart of "the interests." Hale replied—an impassioned eulogy of the departed Dingley—but somehow its passion sounded hollow, sounded like bluster. And then in rapid succession the other paladins strove, but strove in vain. Their tongues tripped, their sentences became entangled, their rhetoric faltered, fizzled, spluttered, expired.

The galleries leaned breathless. Aldrich and his lieutenants sat in frowning, angry circle, eying their conqueror. They had counted on the lack of skill in the minority. They had supposed that Vest was too ill to make the fight. And until he made that fight, arraigned them at the bar of public opinion, calmly showed them that if they persisted they would not save "the interests" but would destroy them and imperil the whole protection system, they had not realized the danger of their own position. Indeed, it was not dangerous until Senator Vest made it so. For there never is a real issue until some man, some leader with the heart to feel an issue and the mind to plan it and the eloquence to state it, rises and points it out and draws the lines of battle.

Aldrich thought it over. He chose the wiser course—to sacrifice the one "interest" for the salvation of the many, to remove at least the sting of fury from the growing popular demand for cutting "the interests" out of the tariff. The duty was taken off coal; the coal crowd, seeing what would be the effect of the object-lesson of their prices forced down by foreign coal actually in the market, made haste to put down the price before importation could begin. But they deceived no one but themselves. The country knew why the price of coal suddenly went tumbling down until it had become comparatively cheap.

It was the most impressive possible object-lesson in the power of one man, no matter who or what or how many or how much opposes, when that man is armed cap-à-pie in justice, and knows when and where and how to strike. If Vest in the very clutches of death could thus snatch victory from such organized and seemingly impregnable might, who that is right need ever despair?

The real measure of that victory has not yet been taken. It was, in fact, a victory in which Vest sheathed his sword in the very heart of his ancient foe, tariff extortion. For never before had he or any other opponent of "the interests" wrenched from them—from Aldrich himself—the admission that a tariff schedule can foster a monopoly, and that the way to strike at monopoly is to repeal its protecting duty.

Senator Vest will never be heard in the Senate again. When he had completed that victory he let his attendant bear him away to the bed from which he had risen to make one more fight, his last.

He belongs in that diminishing group of what may be called the Senators of the old Republic. It may come again, but it is not now. There are only a few of these Senators, less than a dozen. The amazing growth of finance and commerce and manufacture, the development of those lusty beggars, "the interests," the rise of bosses and machines, have changed the character of the Senate. They have filled it with keen-eyed, nimble-witted persons, who are tolerant of and in sympathy with what we may for the moment permit them to call "modern methods." They define compromise with corruption and crime as "statesmanship." They deplore all evil, but they beg tolerance for it lest onslaught upon it shake the foundations of prosperity or party.

Among these "twentieth-century statesmen" sit a few that are in quaint contrast. The most of them are old-fashioned, old-time Southerners. They wear a countrified air. They dress in a style of the long ago and most of them have "back-number beards" of one kind and another. Also they have "back-number" convictions. Regardless of the grins of the smart fellows tricked out in the newest styles of moral tailoring, they dauntlessly profess such antiquities of principle as individualism, no privilege, Government favors to none, economy in public expenditures, principle before pocketbook. They venture to persist in believing that there are matters more important, ambitions more lofty, than getting rich quick—or any other way. With their ancient dress and ancient faces, their lack of private fortunes, their modest way of living and their contempt of gain, they suggest Cato and his little band that rose like bare, forbidding rocks in and against the swollen, splendid tide of the decaying Roman republic's prodigality. They suggest this—but historical parallels are dangerous.

Among these Vest was, take him all round, one of the first, if not the first.

The bald facts of his biography tell an interesting story to those who will use their imaginations.

He comes from Sweet Springs, Missouri. And he has spent most of his leisure there, and not in the neighborhood of stock exchanges or boards of trade or corporation offices. He was born in Frankfort, Kentucky—that was seventy years ago, when Frankfort was a village. He was graduated from Centre College, also Kentucky—a very small, simple, sincere institution. He was graduated from the law department of Transylvania University, also Kentucky, and also uncitified and uncontrolled by the principles of "interests." He went straightway to rural Missouri, sat in the State Legislature, in the Confederate Senate, at forty-nine in the United States Senate. He was three times reëlected, and the last time he said: "Boys, my health is almost gone. This term must be the end. You'll have to get a younger and stronger man to serve you." And he persisted in that resolution. He has never cared for money, and he has little of it. But that does not disturb him. Between the lines of that biography one reads the story of a life of the old-fashioned type. Nowadays a brain like his would not be permitted to grow and bear fruit in surroundings of such simplicity and quietness. And now he has passed from the public stage forever. His record in the Senate is: A great public service at the outset. Peaks of public service throughout, each peak rising not from a dark valley but from the open, level plain. The highest peak at the last.

A Pinch of Attic Salt—By George Horton

IN NEW YORK, Chicago, Boston, in fact wherever a Greek community of any size exists in this country, there you will be sure to find a Greek restaurant and café, if you take the trouble to look for it. A subject of King George is always the proprietor, and you will be informed that he was at one time the most famous cook in Athens—that he would be again, in fact, if he took the trouble to return. In these cafés not only Greeks collect, but Turks of humble origin, for whoever has trained his palate to the savor of Oriental food can never again endure the tasteless and dyspepsia-generating output of the Yankee frying-pan. And there are no better boon companions than your peasant Greek and your yeoman Turk; they cut each others' throats only as a religious duty. There is no personal feeling in the matter and no disrespect.

As these people sit about their Turkish coffee—the only coffee under the sun—and pull tremendously at their narghiles, they tell each other over and over again the "chestnuts" of the far East. I understand their lingo and I have heard their stories with much delight in many cities and in divers cafés, by the whispering Mediterranean and the roaring American street.

One joke that is always perpetrated when jokes are in order tells of the man who asked the Turkish word for bread.

"Sedjak ekmet," was the reply.

"But that means 'hot bread,'" volunteers some one.

"Yes, yes, 'hot bread,'" is the reply; "there is no expression for cold bread in Turkish. They never let it get cold!"

Here is a story that gives us a glance into a little Greek village. A poor priest has killed a goose and he invites a friend. This friend on the way to the parsonage encounters another friend. "Where are you going?" asks Number Two.

"The priest has killed a goose, and I am invited to help him eat it."

"Good!" cries Number Two; "I will come with you." And he locks arms with Number One.

A little farther they meet a friend of Number Two and the same question is asked, with the same result. Thus the company grows, until when the priest's house is at last reached the guests number a dozen or more. Introductions are then in order and Number One presents the company to the astonished Father thus:

"This is my friend; this is my friend's friend; this is my friend's friend's friend."

The good Father expresses the liveliest delight and asks the company to wait a little till he can get things ready. At last all are seated at the table and the servant brings in a number of bowls of very thin, tasteless soup. They eat it and wait for the next course, which proves to be still thinner soup. This is repeated four times, until at last one of the guests, becoming impatient, asks, "But, Father, where is the goose? This is nothing but warm water and salt!"

"Gentlemen," explains the priest, "you cannot imagine with what joy I am overwhelmed at seeing you all here! But you are so many that the goose would not have sufficed. I have therefore had it made into soup. The first course was the soup of the goose; the second, the goose's soup's soup; the third, the goose's soup's soup's soup; shall I have the next brought in? No? I cannot bear the idea of your leaving my house unsatisfied!"

A story that is especially relished by the illiterate tells of the fate of a college professor who visited his native town, usually Smyrna, after long absence in erudite Athens. Of course he had made himself quite obnoxious to the Smyrniotes by his display of superior learning. As he was putting off from shore in a little boat bound for the ship which should take him back to Athens he asked the boatman:

"Boy, do you know astronomy?"

"Astronomy? What's astronomy? I never heard of it."

"What!" cried the professor. "Not know astronomy? There's one quarter of your life gone! You are not more than three-quarters of a man if you do not understand the movements of the heavenly bodies, if you are not acquainted with their names and their distances. Do you know geometry?"

"Geometry? What's geometry?"

"So you don't know geometry!" sighed the professor. "There's another quarter of your life gone. You'll be telling me next that you don't even know trigonometry!"

"No, I never heard of that, either," replied the man.

"There," shouted the professor, "is another quarter of your life gone."

But the man, whose attention had been distracted by this conversation, accidentally upset the boat.

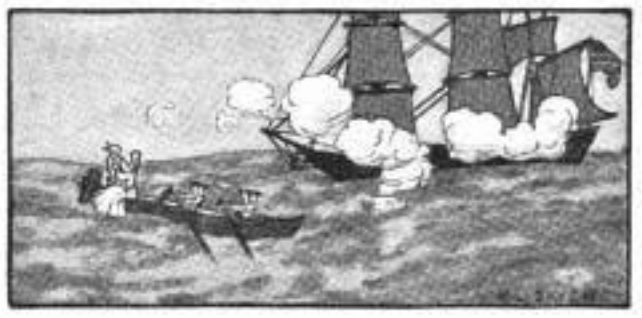
"Do you know how to swim?" he yelled as he struck out for shore.

"No," gurgled the professor.

"Then your whole life is gone, and may the fiend take you!"

The Turks have a story of a retired army officer who was too poor to keep a servant. I do not know its source; I heard it the other evening from the lips of my friend Bethenius, who receives letters in the Turkish language, written with Greek characters.

This old officer had not even the ready money to justify him in sending out his laundry. He therefore concluded to do his own washing. He accordingly asked a neighbor for the loan of a kazani, which is Turkish for cauldron, or boiler. This was obligingly sent to him and the officer washed his linen in the seclusion of his garden. But now, how should he get the kazani home again? For his dignity forbade that he should himself carry so huge an implement through the streets; neither could he ask his neighbor to send for it. At last he hit upon a plan. Wrapping a copper stew-pan in a piece of paper he presented himself at his neighbor's house, saying, "I cannot yet bring home your kazani. Behold, it has become the mother of a stew-pan, which is yours by right. Therefore I bring it to you."



The neighbor, regarding this as a joke, accepted the stew-pan with a laugh. After a few days the officer again appeared, this time with a copper wash-basin.

"Behold," he explained, "your kazani has now become the mother of a wash-basin."

After the officer had departed the neighbor thought deeply.

"I will humor this insanity of his," he said. "May my kazani have a numerous progeny!" But he waited for several weeks in vain. No more copper children appeared and he at last sent for his kazani.

"Tell your master," said the officer, "that I have sorrowful news for him. His kazani is dead!"

The Rhyme of the Chivalrous Shark

By Wallace Irwin

Most chivalrous fish of the ocean,
To ladies forbearing and mild,
Though his record be dark, is the man-eating shark
Who will eat neither woman nor child.

He dines upon seamen and skippers,
And tourists his hunger assuage,
And a fresh cabin boy will inspire him with joy
If he's past the maturity age.

A doctor, a lawyer, a preacher,
He'll gobble one any fine day,
But the ladies, God bless 'em, he'll only address 'em
Politely and go on his way.

I can readily cite you an instance
Where a lovely young lady of Bream,
Who was tender and sweet and delicious to eat,
Fell into the bay with a scream.

She struggled and flounced in the water,
And signaled in vain for her bark,
And she'd surely been drowned if she hadn't been found
By a chivalrous man-eating shark.

He bowed in a manner most polished,
Thus soothing her impulses wild;
"Don't be frightened," he said, "I've been properly bred,
And will touch neither woman nor child."

Then he proffered his fin and she took it—
Such a gallantry none can dispute—
While the passengers cheered as the vessel they neared
And a broadside was fired in salute.

And they soon stood alongside the vessel,
When a life-saving dingey was lowered
With the pick of the crew, and her relatives, too,
And the mate and the skipper aboard.

So they took her aboard in a jiffy,
And the shark stood attention the while,
Then he raised on his flipper and ate up the skipper
And went on his way with a smile.

And this shows that the prince of the ocean,
To ladies forbearing and mild,
Though his record be dark, is the man-eating shark
Who will eat neither woman nor child.

The Awakening of George Raymond—By Lloyd Osbourne

"THE FOLKS WANT TO KNOW YOU," HE SAID

THE STORY OF A MIDDLE-AGED YOUNG MAN AND OF HOW A YEAR IN THE NAVY DURING THE SPANISH WAR TAUGHT HIM HIS OWN POSSIBILITIES

CHAPTER I

GEORGE RAYMOND'S father had been a rich man, rich in those days before the word millionaire had been invented, and when a [illegible] hundred thousand, lent out at interest varying from ten to thirteen per cent., brought in [illegible] a banker of a small New Jersey [illegible] respectability, who proffered two [illegible] poorer clients and spoke about the weather as though it belonged to him. When the school-children read of Cræsus in their mythology book, it was Jacob Raymond they saw in their mind's eye; such expressions as "rich beyond the dreams of avarice" suggested him as inevitably as pumpkin did pie; they wondered doubtfully about him in church when that unfortunate matter of the camel was brought up, with its attendant difficulties for the wealthy. Even Captain Kidd's treasure, in those times so actively sought for along the whole stretch of the New England coast, conjured up a small brick building with "Jacob Raymond, Banker" in gilt letters above the lintel of the door.

But there came a day when that door stayed locked and a hundred pale faces gathered about it, blocking the village street and talking in whispers though the noonday sun was shining. Raymond's bank was insolvent, and the banker himself, a fugitive in tarry sea-clothes, was hauling ropes on a vessel outward bound for Callao. He might have stayed in Middleborough and braved it out, for he had robbed no man and his personal honor was untarnished, having succumbed without dishonesty to primitive methods and lack of capital. But he chose instead the meaner course of flight. Of all the reproachful faces he left behind him his wife's was the one he felt himself the least able to confront; and thus abandoning everything, with hardly a dozen dollars in his pocket, he slipped away to sea, never to be seen or heard of again.

Mrs. Raymond was a woman of forty-five, a New Englander to her finger-tips, proud, arrogant and fiercely honest; a woman who never forgot, never forgave, and who practiced her narrow Christianity with the unrelentingness of an Indian. She lived up to an austere standard herself and woe betide those who fell one whit behind her. She was one of those just persons who would have cast the first stone at the dictates of conscience and with a sort of holy joy in her own fitness to do so. For years she had been the richest woman in Middleborough, the head of everything charitable and religious, the mainstay of ministers, the court of final appeal in the case of sinners and backsliders. Now in a moment, through no fault of her own, the whole fabric of her life had crumbled. Again had the mighty fallen.

She had not a spark of pity for her husband. To owe what you could not pay was to her the height of dishonor. It was theft; and she had no compunction in giving it the name, however it might be disguised or palliated. She could see no mitigating circumstances in Raymond's disgrace, and the fact that she was innocently involved in his downfall filled her with exasperation. The big old corner house was her own. She had been born in it. It had been her marriage portion from her father. She put it straightway under the hammer; her canal stock with it; her furniture and linen; a row of five little cottages on the outskirts of the town where five poor families had found not only that their bodies, but the welfare of their souls, had been confided to her grim keeping. She stripped herself of everything, and when all had been made over to the creditors there still remained a deficit of seventeen hundred dollars. This debt which was not a debt, for she was under no legal compulsion to pay a penny of it, would willingly have been condoned by men already grateful for her generosity; but she would hear of no such compromise, not even that her notes be free of interest, and she gave them at five per cent., resolute that in time she would redeem them to the uttermost farthing.

Under these sudden changes of fortune it is seldom that the sufferer remains amid the ruins of past prosperity. The human instinct is to fly and hide. The wound heals more readily amongst strangers. The material evils of life are never so intolerable as the public loss of caste. It may be said that it is people, not things, which cause most of the world's unhappiness. Mrs. Raymond came to New York, where she had [illegible] the son she brought with her, there to get [illegible] with an undaunted heart to earn the seventeen [illegible] she had voluntarily taken on her shoulders to repay.

George Raymond, her son, was then a boy of fifteen. High-strung, high-spirited, with all the seriousness of a youngster who had prematurely learned to think for himself, he had arrived at the age when ineffaceable impressions are made and the tendencies of a lifetime decided. Passionately attached to his father, he had lost him in a way that would have made death seem preferable. He saw his mother, so shortly before the great lady of a little town, working out like a servant in other people's houses. The tragedy of it all ate into his soul and overcame him with a sense of hopelessness and despair. It would not have been so hard could he have helped, even in a small way, toward the recovery of their fortunes; but his mother, faithful even in direst poverty to her New England blood, sent him to school, determined that at any sacrifice he should finish his education. But by degrees Mrs. Raymond drifted into another class of work. She became a nurse, and in a situation where her conscientiousness was invaluable slowly established a connection that in time kept her constantly busy. She won the regard of an important physician, and not only won it but kept it, and thus little by little found her way into good houses where she was highly paid and treated with consideration.

Had it not been for the seventeen hundred dollars and the five per cent. interest upon it she could have earned enough to keep herself and her son very comfortably in the three rooms they occupied on Seventh Street. But this debt, ever present in the minds of both mother and son, hung over them like a cloud and took every penny there was to spare. Those two years from fifteen to seventeen were the most terrible in Raymond's life. At an age when he possessed neither philosophy nor knowledge, and yet the fullest capacity to suffer, he had to bear, with what courage he could muster, the cruelest buffets of an adverse Fate.

Raymond drudged at his books, passed from class to class and returned at night to the empty rooms he called home, where he cooked his own meals and sat solitary beside the candle until it was the hour for bed. His mother was seldom there to greet him. As a nurse she was kept prisoner for weeks at a time in the houses where she was engaged. It meant much to the boy to find a note from her lying on the table when he returned at night; more still to wait at street corners in his shabby overcoat for those appointments she often made with him. When she took infectious cases and dared neither write nor speak to him, they had an hour planned beforehand when she would smile at him from an open window and wave a handkerchief.

But she was not invariably busy. There were intervals between her engagements when she remained at home; when those rooms, ordinarily so lonely and still, took on a wonderful brightness with her presence; when Raymond, coming back from school late in the afternoon, ran along the streets singing as he thought of his mother awaiting him. This stern woman, the harsh daughter of a harsh race, had but a single streak of tenderness in her withered heart. To her son she gave a transcendent love, and the whole of her starved nature went out to him in immeasurable devotion. Their poverty, the absence of all friends, the burden of debt, the unacknowledged disgrace, and (harder still to bear) the long and enforced separations from each other, all served to draw the pair into the closest intimacy. Raymond grew toward manhood without ever having met a girl of his own age; without ever having had a chum; without knowing the least thing of youth save much of its green-sickness and longing.

When the great debt had been paid off and the last of the notes canceled there came no corresponding alleviation of their straightened circumstances. Raymond had graduated from the high-school and was taking the medical course at Columbia University. Every penny that could be wrung was put by for the unavoidable expenses of his tuition. The mother, shrewd, ambitious and far-seeing, was staking everything against the future, and was wise enough to sacrifice the present in order to launch her son into a profession. In those days fresh air had not been discovered. Athletics, then in their infancy, were regarded much as we now do prize-fighting. The ideal student was a pale individual who wore out the night with cold towels around his head, and who had a bigger appetite for books than for meat. Docile, unquestioning, knowing no law but his mother's wish; eager to earn her commendation and to repay with usury the immense sacrifices she had made for him, Raymond worked himself to a shadow with study, and at nineteen was a tall, thin, narrow-shouldered young man with sunken cheeks and a preternatural whiteness of complexion.

He was far from being a bad-looking fellow, however. He had beautiful blue eyes, more like a girl's than a man's, and there was something earnest and winning in his face that often got him a shy glance on the street from passing women. His acquaintance in this direction went no further. Many times when a college acquaintance would have included him in some little party, his mother had peremptorily refused to let him go. Her face would darken with jealousy and anger, nor was she backward with a string of reasons for her refusal. It would unsettle him; he had no money to waste on girls; he would be shamed by his shabby clothes and ungloved hands; they would laugh at him behind his back; was he tired, then, of his old mother who had worked so hard to bring him up decently? And so on and so on until, without knowing exactly why, Raymond would feel himself terribly in the wrong, and was glad enough at last to be forgiven on the understanding that he should never propose such a reprehensible thing again.

In any other young man, brought up in the ordinary way, with the ordinary advantages, such submission would have seemed mean-spirited; but the bond between these two was riven with memories of penury and privation; any appeal to those black days brought Raymond on his knees; it was intolerable to him that he should ever cause a pang in his dear mother's breast. Thus, at the age when the heart is hungriest for companionship; when for the first time a young man seems to discover the existence of a hitherto unknown and unimportant sex; when an inner voice urges him to take his place in the ranks and keep step with the mighty army of his generation, Raymond was doomed to walk alone, a wistful outcast, regarding his enviable companions from afar.

He was in his second year at college when his studies were broken off by his mother's illness. He was suddenly called home to find her delirious in bed, struck down in the full tide of strength by the disease she had taken from a patient. It was scarlet fever, and when it had run its course the doctor took him to one side and told him that his mother's nursing days were over. During her tedious convalescence, as Raymond would sit beside her bed and read aloud to her, their eyes were constantly meeting in unspoken apprehension. They saw the ground, so solid a month before, now crumbling beneath their feet; their struggles, their makeshifts, their starved and meagre life had all been in vain. Their little savings were gone; the breadwinner, tempting fate once too often, had received what was to her worse than a mortal wound, for the means of livelihood had been taken from her.

"Could I have but died!" she repeated to herself. "Oh, could I have but died!"

Raymond laid his head against the coverlet and sobbed. He needed no words to tell him what was in her mind; that her illness had used up the little money there was to spare; that she, so long the support of both, was now a helpless burden on his hands. Pity for her outweighed every other consideration. His own loss seemed but little in comparison to hers. It was the concluding tragedy of those five tragic years. The battle, through no fault of theirs, had gone against them. The dream of a professional career was over.

His mother grew better. The doctor ceased his visits. She was able to get on her feet again. She took over their pinched housekeeping. But her step was heavy; the gaunt, grim, straight-backed woman, with her thin gray hair and set mouth, was no more than a spectre of her former self. The doctor was right. In the words of the Psalmist her strength was laid waste.

Raymond found work; a place in the auditing department of a railroad with a salary to begin with of sixty dollars a month. In ten years he might hope to get a hundred. But he was one of those whose back bent easily to misfortune. Heaven knew, he had been schooled long enough to take its blows with fortitude. His mother and he could manage comfortably on sixty dollars a month; and when he laid his first earnings in her hand he even smiled with satisfaction. She took the money in silence, her heart too full to ask him whence it came. She had hoped against hope until that moment; and the bills, as she looked at them, seemed to sting her shriveled hand.

One day as she was cleaning her son's room she opened a box that stood in the corner, and was surprised to find it contain a package done up in wrapping-paper. She opened it with curiosity and the tears sprang to her eyes as she saw the second-hand medical books George had used at college. Here they were, in neat wrappers, laid by forever. Too precious to throw away, too articulate of unfulfilled ambitions to stand exposed on shelves, they had been laid away in the grave of her son's hopes. She did them up again with trembling fingers, and that night when George returned to supper he found his mother in the dark, crying.

"I AM SPEAKING TO YOU AS THOUGH I HAD KNOWN YOU ALL MY LIFE"

CHAPTER II

IN THE years from nineteen to forty-two most men have fulfilled their destiny: those who have had within them the ability to rise have risen; the weak, the wastrels, the mediocrities, have shaken down into their appointed places. Even the bummer has his own particular bit of wall in front of the saloon and his own particular chair within. Those who have something to do are busy doing it, whether it be burglary or tea-tasting, selling pianos on the installment plan or making pop hats for opera-goers. In the human comedy every one in time finds his rôle and must play it to the end, happy indeed if he be cast in a part that at all suits him.

George Raymond at forty-two was still in the auditor's department. Time had wrinkled his cheek, had turned his brown hair to a crisp gray, had bowed his shoulders to the desk he had used for twenty-two years. His eyes alone retained their boyish brightness, and a sort of appealing look as of one who his whole life long had been a dependent on other people. As an automaton, a mere cog in a vast machine, he had won the praise of his superiors by his complete self-effacement. He was never ill, never absent, never had trouble with his subordinates, never talked back, never made complaints, and, in the flattering language of the superintendent, "he knew what he knew!"

In the office, as in every other aggregation of human beings, there were coteries, cliques, friendships and hatreds, jealousies, heartburnings and vendettas. There was scarcely a man there without friends or foes. Raymond alone had neither. To the others he was a strange, silent, unknown creature whose very address was a matter of conjecture; a man who did not drink, did not smoke, did not talk; who ate four bananas for his luncheon and invariably carried a book in the pocket of his shabby coat. It was said of him that once, during a terrible blizzard, he had been the only clerk to reach the office; that he had worked there stark alone until one o'clock, when at the stroke of the hour he had taken out his four bananas and his book! There were other stories about him of the same kind, not all of them true to fact, but essentially true of the man's nature and of his rigid adherence to routine. He had risen, place by place, to a position that gave him a hundred and fifty dollars a month, and one so responsible that his death or absence would have dislocated the office for half a day.

"A first-class man and an authority on pro-ratas!"

Such might have been the inscription on George Raymond's tomb!

His mother was still alive. She had never entirely regained her health or her strength, and it took all the little she had of either to do the necessary housekeeping for herself and her boy. Thin to emaciation, sharp-tongued, a tyrant to her finger-tips, her indomitable spirit remained as uncowed as ever and she ruled her son with a rod of iron. To her, Georgie, as she always called him, was still a child. As far as she was concerned he had never grown up. She took his month's salary, told him when to buy new shirts, ordered his clothes herself, doled out warningly the few dollars for his necessaries, and saved, saved, continually saved. The old woman dreaded poverty with a horror not to be expressed in words. It had ruined her own life; it had crushed her son under its merciless wheels; in the words of the classic proverb she was the coward who died a thousand deaths in the agonies of apprehension. She was one of those not uncommon misers who hoard, not for love of money but through fear. She had managed, with penurious thrift and a self-denial almost sublime in its austerity, to set aside eight thousand dollars. Eight thousand dollars from an income that began at sixty and rose to a little under three times that amount! Eight thousand dollars, wrung from their lives at the price of every joy, every alleviation, everything that could make the world barely tolerable.

Every summer Raymond had a two weeks' holiday which he spent at Middleborough with some relatives of his father. He had the pronounced love of the sea that is usual with those born and bred in seaport towns. His earliest memories went back to great deep-water ships, their jib-booms poking into the second story windows of the city front, their decks hoarsely melodious with the yeo-heave-yeo of straining seamen. The smell of tar, the sight of enormous anchors impending above the narrow street, the lofty masts piercing the sky in a tangle of ropes and blocks, the exotic cargoes mountains high, all moved him like a poem. He knew no pleasure like that of sailing his cousin's sloop; he loved every plank of her dainty hull; it was to him a privilege to lay his hand to any task appertaining to her, however humble or hard. To caulk, to paint, to polish brasswork, to pump out bilge, to set up the rigging, to splice ropes, to sit cross-legged and patch sails, and, best of all, to put her lee rail under in a spanking breeze and race her seaward against the mimic fleet. Ah, how swiftly those bright days passed, how bitter was the parting and the return, all too soon, to the dingy offices of the railroad.

It never occurred to him to think his own lot hard, or to contrast himself with other men of his age, who at forty-two were mostly substantial members of society, with interests, obligations, responsibilities to which he himself was an utter stranger. Under the iron bondage of his mother he had remained a child. To displease her seemed the worst thing that could befall him; to win her praise filled him with content. But there were times, guiltily remembered and put by with shame, when he longed for something more from life; when the sight of a beautiful woman on the street reminded him of his own loneliness and isolation; when he was overcome with a sudden surging sense that he was an outsider in the midst of these teeming thousands, unloved and old, without friends or hope or future to look forward to. He would reproach himself for such lawless repining, for such disloyalty to his mother. Was not her case worse than his? Did she not lecture him on the duty of cheerfulness, she the invalid, racked with pains, with nerves, who practiced so pitifully what she preached? The tears would come to his eyes. No, he would not ask the impossible; he would go his way, brave and uncomplaining, and let the empty years roll over his head without a single murmur against fate.

But the years, apparently so void, were screening a strange and undreamed-of part for him to play. The Spaniards, a vague, almost legendary people, as remote from Raymond's life as the Assamese or the cliff-dwellers of New Mexico, began to take on a concrete character, and were suddenly discovered to be the enemies of the human race. Raymond grew accustomed to the sight of Cuban flags, at first so unfamiliar and then later so touching in their significance.

Newspaper pictures of Gomez and Garcia were tacked on the homely walls of barber-shops, in railroad shops, in grubby offices and cargo elevators, and with them savage caricatures of a person called Weyler and referring bitterly to other persons (who seemed in a bad way) called the reconcentrados. Raymond wondered what it was all about; bought books to elucidate the matter; took fire with indignation and resentment. Then came the Maine affair; the suspense of seventy million people eager to avenge their dead; the decision of the Court of Inquiry; the emergency vote; the preparation for war. Raymond watched it all with a curious detachment. He had never realized that it could have anything personally to do with him. The long days in the auditor's department went on undisturbed for all that the country was arming and the State Governors were calling out their quotas of men. Two of his associates quitted their desks and changed their black coats for army blue. Raymond admired them, envied them; but it never occurred to him to ask why they should go and he should stay. It was natural for him to stay; it was inevitable; he was as much a part of the office as the office floor.

One afternoon, going home on the Elevated, he overheard two men talking.

"I don't know what we'll do," said one.

"Oh, there are lots of men," said the other.

"Men, yes, but no sailors," said the first.

"That's right," said the other.

"We are at our wits' end to man the ships," said the first.

"What did you total up to-day?" said the other.

His companion shrugged his shoulders.

"Eighty applicants and seven taken," he said.

"And those foreigners?"

"All but two!"

"There's danger in that kind of thing!"

"Yes, indeed; but what can you do?"

The words rang in Raymond's head. That night he hardly slept. He was in the throes of making a tremendous resolution; he who for forty years had been tied to his mother's apron-strings. Making it of his own volition, unprompted, at the behest of no one save perhaps the man in the car, asserting at last his manhood in defiance of the subjection that had never come home to him until that moment. He rose in the morning pale and determined. He felt a hypocrite through and through as his mother commented on his looks and grew anxious as he pushed away his untasted breakfast. It came over him afresh how good she was, how tender.

He got an extension of the noon hour and hurried down to the naval recruiting office. It was doing a brisk business in turning away applicants, and from the bottom of the line Raymond was not kept waiting long before he attained the top; and from thence, in his turn, was led into an inner office. He was briefly examined as to his sea experience. Could he box the compass? He could. Could he make a long splice? He could. What was meant by the monkey-gaff of a full-rigged ship? He told them. What was his reason in wanting to join the Navy? Because he thought he'd like to do something for his country. "Very good; turn him over to the doctor; next!" Then the doctor weighed him, looked at his teeth, hit him in the chest, listened to his heart, thumped and questioned him and then passed him on to a third person to be enrolled.

When George Raymond emerged into the open air it was as a full A B in the service of the United States.

This announcement at the office made an extraordinary sensation. Men he hardly knew shook hands with him and clapped him on the back. He was taken upstairs to be impressively informed that his position would be held open for him. On every side he saw kindling faces, smiling glances of approbation, the quick passing of the news in whispers. He had suddenly risen from obscurity to become part of the war: the heir of a wonderful and possibly tragic future.

The scene at home was less enthusiastic. It was even mortifying, and Georgie, as his mother invariably called him, had to endure a storm of sarcasm and reproaches. The old woman's ardent patriotism stopped short at giving up her son. It was the duty of others to fight, Georgie's to stay at home with his mother. He let her talk herself out, saying little, but regarding her with a grave, kind obstinacy. Then she broke down, weeping and clinging to him. Somehow, though he could hardly explain it to himself, the relation between the two underwent a change. He left that house the unquestioned master of himself, the acknowledged head of that tiny household; he had won, and his victory, instead of abating by a hair's breadth his mother's love for him, had drawn the pair closer to each other than ever before.

Her tenderness and devotion were redoubled. Never had there been such a son in the history of the world. She relaxed her economies in order to buy him little delicacies such as sardines and pickles, and when soon after his enlistment his uniform came home she spread it on her bed and cried, and then sank on her knees, passionately kissing the coarse serge. In the limitation of her horizon she could see but a single figure. It was Georgie's country, Georgie's President, Georgie's fleet, Georgie's righteous quarrel in the cause of stifled freedom. To her it was Georgie's war with Spain.

He was drafted aboard the Casco, where within a week of his joining he was promoted to be one of the four quartermasters. So much older than the majority of his comrades, quick, alert, obedient and responsible, he was naturally among the first chosen for what are called leading seamen. Never was a man more in his element than George Raymond. He shook down into naval life like one born to it. The sea was in his blood, and his translation from the auditor's department to the deck of a fighting ship seemed to him like one of those happy dreams when one pinches one's self to try and confirm the impossible. Metaphorically speaking, he was always pinching himself and contrasting the monotonous past with the glorious and animated present. The change told in his manner, in the tilt of his head, in his fearless eyes and straighter back.

Amongst Raymond's comrades on the Casco was a youngster of twenty-one named Howard Quintan. Something in the boy attracted him, and he went out of his way to make things smooth for him aboard. The liking was no less cordially returned and the two became fast friends. One day, when they were both given liberty together, Howard insisted on taking him to his own home.

"The folks want to know you," he said. "They naturally think a heap of you because I do, and I've told them how good you've been, and all that."

"Oh, rubbish!" said Raymond, though he was inwardly pleased. At the time they were walking up Fifth Avenue, both in uniform, with their caps on one side, sailor fashion, and their wide trousers flapping about their ankles. People looked at them kindly as they passed, for the shadow of the war lay on every one and all hearts went out to the men who were to uphold the flag. Raymond was flattered and yet somewhat overcome by the attention his companion and he excited.

"Let's get out of this, Quint," he said. "I can't walk straight when people look at me like that. Don't you feel kind of givey-givey at the knees with all those pretty girls loving us in advance?"

"Oh, that's what I like," said Quintan. "I never got a glance when I used to sport a silk hat. Besides, here we are at the old stand!"

Raymond regarded him with blank surprise as they turned aside and up the steps of one of the houses.

"Land's sake!" he exclaimed, "you don't mean to say you live in a place like this? Here?" he added with an intonation that caused Howard to burst out laughing.

The young fellow pushed by the footman that admitted them and ran up the stairs three steps at a time. Raymond followed more slowly, dazed by the splendor he saw about him, and feeling horribly embarrassed and deserted. He halted on the stairs as he saw Quintan throw his arms about a tall, stately, magnificently dressed woman and kiss her boisterously; and he was in two minds whether or not to slink down again and disappear when his companion called out to him to hurry up.

"Mother, this is Mr. Raymond," he said. "He's the best friend I have on the Casco, and you're to be awfully good to him."

Mrs. Quintan graciously gave him her hand and said something about his kindness to her boy. Raymond was too stricken to speak and was thankful for the semi-darkness that hid his face. Mrs. Quintan continued softly, in the same sweet and overpowering manner, to purr her gratitude and try to put him at his ease. Raymond would have been a happy man could he have sunk through the parquetry floor. He trembled as he was led into the drawing-room, where another gracious and overpowering creature rose to receive them.

"My aunt, Miss Christine Latimer," said Howard.

She was younger than Mrs. Quintan; a tall, fair woman of middle age, with a fine figure, hair streaked with gray, and the remains of what had once been extreme beauty. Her voice was the sweetest Raymond had ever listened to, and his shyness and agitation wore off as she began to speak to him. He was left a long while alone with her, for Howard and his mother withdrew, excusing themselves on the score of private matters. Christine Latimer was touched by the forlorn quartermaster, who, in his nervousness, gripped his chair with clenched hands and started when he was asked a question. She soon got him past this stage of their acquaintance, and, leading him on by gentle gradations to talk about himself, even learned his whole story, and that in so unobtrusive a fashion that he was hardly aware of his having told it to her.

"I am speaking to you as though I had known you all my life," he said in an artless compliment. "I hope it is not very forward of me. It is your fault for being so kind and good."

He was ecstatic when he left the house with Quintan.

"I didn't know there were such women in the world," he said. "So noble, so winning and high-bred. It makes you understand history to meet people like that. Mary Queen of Scots, Marie Antoinette and all those, you know—they must have been like that. I—I could understand a man dying for Miss Latimer!"

"Oh, she's all right—my aunt," said Quintan. "She was a tremendous beauty once and even now she's what I'd call a devilish handsome woman. And the grand manner—it isn't everybody that likes it, but I do. It's a little old-fashioned nowadays, but, by Jove, it still tells."

"I wonder that such a splendid woman should have remained unmarried," said Raymond. He stuck an instant on the word unmarried. It seemed almost common to apply to such a princess.

"She had an early love affair that turned out badly," said Quintan. "I don't know what went wrong, but anyway it didn't work. Then when my father died she came to live with us and help bring us up—you see there are two more of us in the family—and I'm told she refused some good matches just on account of us kids. It makes me feel guilty sometimes to think of it."

"Why guilty?" asked Raymond.

"Because none of us were worth it, old chap," said Quintan.

"I'm sure she never thought so," observed Raymond.

"My aunt's rather an unusual woman," said Quintan. "She has voluntarily played second fiddle all her life; and between you and me, you know, my mother's a bit of a tyrant and not always easy to get along with—so it wasn't so dead simple a game as it looks."

Raymond was shocked at this way of putting the matter.

"You mean she sacrificed the best years of her life for you," he said stiffly.

"Women are like that—good women," said Quintan. "Catch a man being such a fool—looking at it generally, you know—me apart. She has a tidy little fortune from her father and might have had a yard of her own to play in, but our little baby hands held her tight."

Raymond regarded his companion's hands. They were large and red and rough with the hard work on board the Casco; regarded them respectfully, almost with awe, for had they not restrained that glorious being in the full tide of her youth and beauty!

"Now it's too late," said Quintan.

"What do you mean by too late?" asked the quartermaster.

"Well, she's passed forty," said Quintan. "The babies have grown up and the selfish beasts are striking out for themselves. Her occupation's gone and she's left planté là. Worse than that, my mother, who never bothered two cents about us then, now loves us to distraction. And when all's said, you know, it's natural to like your mother best!"

"Too bad!" ejaculated Raymond.

"I call it deuced hard luck," said Quintan. "My mother really neglected us shamefully, and it was Aunt Christine who brought us up and blew our noses and rubbed us with goose-grease when we had croup and all that kind of thing. Then when we grew up my mother suddenly discovered her long-lost children and began to think a heap of us—after having scamped the whole business for fifteen years—and my aunt, who was the real nigger in the hedge, got kind of let out, you see."

Raymond did not see, and he was indignant besides at the coarseness of his companion's expressions. So he walked along and said nothing.

"And as I said before, it's now too late," said Quintan.

"Too late for what?" demanded Raymond, who was deeply interested.

"For her to take up with anybody else," said Quintan. "To marry, you know. She sacrificed all her opportunities for us; and now, in the inevitable course of things, we are kind of abandoning her when she is old and faded and lonely."

"I consider your aunt one of the most beautiful women in the world," protested Raymond.

"But you can't put back the clock, old fellow," said Quintan. "What has the world to offer to an old maid of forty-two? There she is in the empty nest, and not her own nest at that, with all her little nestlings flying over the hills and far away, and the genuine mother-bird varying the monotony by occasionally pecking her eyes out."

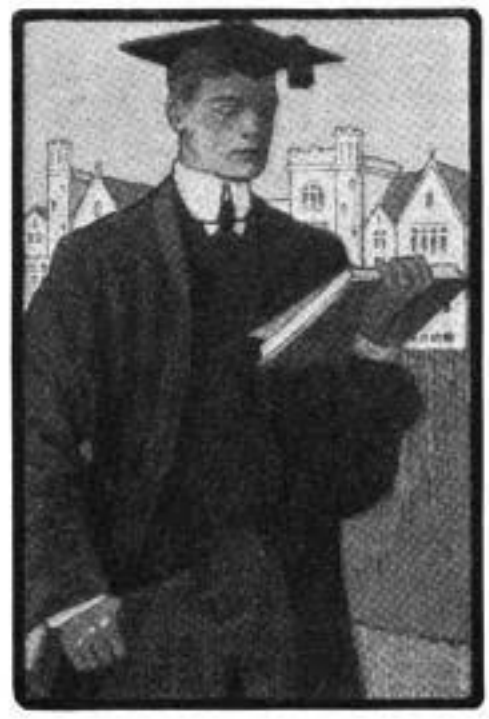
Raymond did not know what to answer. He could not be so rude as to make any reflection on Mrs. Quintan, though he was stirred with resentment against her. This noble, angelic, saintly woman, who in every gesture reminded him of dead queens and historic personages! It went to his heart to think of her, bereft and lonely, in that splendid house he had so lately quitted. He recognized, in the unmistakable accord between him and her, the fellowship of a pair who in different ways and in different stations had yet fought and suffered and endured for what they judged their duty. Forty-two years old! Singular coincidence, in itself almost a bond between them, that he, too, was of an identical age.

"Why don't you say something?" said Quintan.

"I was just thinking how mistaken you were," returned Raymond. "There must be hundreds of men who would be proud to win her slightest regard; who instead of considering her faded or old would choose her out of thousands of younger women and would be happy forever if she would take——" He was going to say "them," but that sounded improper and he changed it, at the cost of grammar, to "him."

Quintan laughed at his companion's vehemence, and the subject passed and gave way to shrapnel. But he did not fail, later, to carry a humorous report of the conversation to his aunt.

"What have you been doing to my old quartermaster?" he said. "Hasn't the poor fellow enough troubles as it is without falling in love with you! He can't talk of anything else, and blushes like a girl when he mentions your name. He told me yesterday he was willing to die for a woman like you."



"I think he's a dear, nice fellow," said Miss Latimer, "and if he wants to love me he may. It will keep him out of mischief!"

TALKS WITH A KID BROTHER AT COLLEGE

Making the Team

By Jesse Lynch Williams

WHAT of it—what if you couldn't make the team? What's that got to do with it? That isn't the reason I wanted you to go in for athletics. Why didn't you fight it out! The chief benefit of athletics is to teach you to quit being a quitter. Last fall when you left off trying for the freshman eleven I felt sorry, but you put it on the ground of your studies and said you'd come out when the call for baseball candidates was issued in the early spring. But your name isn't in the list published in the paper. You haven't the face to blame it on your studies this time, Dick; I have seen your reports! You are afraid of being laughed at; that's what's the matter.

Did you ever hear about the case of big, fatty Simon? He was laughed at. They called him Simple Simon. He was here in the early days of football, before the Rugby game had spread all over the country. He weighed about two hundred and eighty pounds, mostly fat, and I don't suppose he had ever seen a canvas jacket until the day he entered college and waddled down to the field along with a lot of other green freshmen to look at the football practice. It interested him. He was so much interested that he paid no attention to the sophomores who were guying him about his fat and his simplicity. "I should think that game would be fun," he said in a high, squeaky voice. "I think I'll play," he announced to his classmates.

"That's right," said they, chuckling at Simple Simon; "just your game, old man."

"Yes. You see I can't play many games," smiled Simon simply, trying to peep at his boots.

"Tell the captain you are a candidate," said they, chuckling.

"Think I stand a chance?"

"A chance? It's a dead cinch."

"All right," said Simple. "I will." And he did.

The captain looked him over and smiled. "I don't believe we have any suit to fit you," he said kindly, "but you come down to-morrow. That's the right spirit."

The college along the side lines smiled audibly the next day when Simple Simon trotted out with the other men, or tried to, puffing and blowing, in a much-stretched sweater and a pair of breeches that had been opened in the rear to admit him. But he was accustomed to being a cause of amusement and did not mind. They laughed louder still when in the first scrimmage he was toppled over like a huge ninepin. "Did you feel the earth shake?" asked a humorist.

The businesslike captain yelled, "Line up, fellows!" The crowd roared; they saw Simon lying there on his back, flapping his arms and legs like an overturned turtle. He was not hurt—simply too fat. The next scrimmage the same thing happened. After that they reached over to pull him up as a matter of course. But with three or four more scrimmages Simple Simon had to retire, winded. A group of sophomores guyed him as he waddled past to the field house.

"It's a good game, though," he piped up to the trainer as soon as he got breath enough.

"Are you coming out to-morrow?" he was asked when he came out of the shower bath.

"You bet!" said he.

Simple Simon kept it up. After the trainer had taken about thirty pounds off him he could last a full half, and could keep his feet for several minutes at a time. By and by he learned to get up alone. That was a proud day. The laughing crowds along the side lines cheered him.

"You're a perfect corker, Simple," his chaffing classmates told him.

"A regular Hector Cowan," said another. "You'll make the team yet."

"Aw! come off—you're trying to guy me, I believe," said Simple. He thought himself quite sophisticated by this time. But he grinned and kept on trying. "It's good sport, anyway," he said as he wiped the blood away from his torn ear.

The coaches smiled at his cheerfulness. "That big, fat freshman can give some of you fellows points in the way of spirit," they said to the 'Varsity eleven. Besides, it was good practice for the guards, wielding such a great weight—like a medicine-ball.

After two years of this, most of Simon's fat was worn off by the trampling, shoving and butting the 'Varsity gave him; the rest was turned into solid muscle by the trampling, shoving and butting he gave the 'Varsity. Also, he was studying the game. The crowd had stopped laughing at him. "That's all right," they said, wagging their heads, "he's got the right spirit, even if he hasn't got the right shape for making the team." In his junior year he was taken to New York on Thanksgiving Day as a substitute—with a huge sweater pulled down over his hips. And in his senior year he was on the team, the champion football team of America. The fearless way he used to charge down the field like a fighting elephant and smash those old-fashioned flying wedges—by flopping down in front of them—is now a matter of football history.

He is the stout gentleman I pointed out to you one day at the club with the two gold football emblems on his watch-chain. No, they don't laugh at him now, and his voice isn't high and squeaky. But it wasn't because he had the honor, merely, of being a member of the team that he became a man of force and self-reliance, but because he was willing to accept the bumps and thumps and discouragement that seem the incidental parts but are really the most important features of the game—and of all athletic sports, so far as concerns the actual benefit to those who are playing. But if he had let the jeers and gibes, which, after all, were good-natured gibes, drive him off the football field he might have remained something of a big, fat booby to this day.

Hearing a little laughter won't hurt you a bit, but fearing it will harm you greatly. To so many people laughter in this sense suggests an attitude of superiority over the one laughed at. As a matter of fact, jeers and sneers are more frequently prompted by a jealous sense of inferiority.

I take no stock in this driveling cant about "daring to do right, despite the laughter and ridicule of the world," and all that long-faced tommyrot, promulgated mostly by emasculated individuals who know very little about the world and don't dare do wrong. The world is not so bad—in its admirations, I mean, whatever may be said of its practices.

It so happens that I have had to run up against a good many different kinds of people since I landed on this much-maligned and very interesting world, but I have yet to find any of them setting a higher value on a man for selling himself out cheap. I have yet to meet the Sunday-school-book kind who like a man better for not "daring to say no." The difficulty is not in saying no, but in doing it. Nobody will object to your saying it unless you whine it with a timid, shame-faced bleat, or else bray it out with blatant self-righteousness. In either of these cases you will deserve to be laughed at because you will be funny.

When I said "nobody" just now I meant no man. This does not apply to downy kids and nincompoops—"paper sports," I believe you call them. In my day there was a little Southerner named Reddy Armstrong, and he was the real thing—whew! you would have called him a "paper sport!" For two years he kept up a thrilling pace. He marked out a vivid red career. He was the sort who can stay up all night doing things he was not sent to college for—"extra-curriculum work"; and then after a cold plunge in the morning he'd seem as fresh and cool and clear-eyed as an athlete in training. Some of the fellows used to call him the Deacon, not only on account of the aforementioned reasons, but because, fond as he was of poker, when twelve o'clock struck on Saturday night he always threw down his hand, no matter how promising it looked, and said in his broad, delightful manner: "Gentlemen, it is Sunday morning. I bid you good-night."

In Junior-year vacation Reddy became very well acquainted with his roommate's sister and—he came back to college a new man. He felt benignantly sorry for all the others who were not also new men—but did not tell them so unless he knew them well enough. One night at a house-party in the Christmas holidays a very young New Yorker, of the would-be-wicked variety—yes, he was a "paper sport"—tried to get the Deacon to join with him in a game in the smoking-room with some of the older men of the party. The Deacon thanked them for the honor, bowed politely and begged to be excused.

"What, and you a Kentuckian!" exclaimed one of the older men, who was shocked.

"It certainly does sound very incongruous," said the Deacon, smiling urbanely, "but you'll have to manage without me, I reckon."

"Oh, come on, old man," said the paper sport.

"If I were playing," thought Reddy, "you would be an easy mark." But he only said, "Thank you, no." The older men had, of course, stopped urging him.

The paper sport exhaled a lungful of cigarette smoke cynically. "'Fraid, are you?" he said.

Reddy looked up. "Exactly," he replied quickly. "I'm afraid to get in, and you're afraid to keep out." Somehow the laugh was on the paper sport, and he wondered why it was, throughout the rest of the visit, that they treated him like an infant and little Reddy like a man they respected.

Long-legged Frank Berkhart, the famous old catcher, was the most respected man on the team, not because he was the best player—as a matter of fact, he wasn't—but because he seemed absolutely independent of popular opinion, and hence got the best of it. The manager of the team that year was one of the most profane young men I ever knew. But he adored Frank. On the Easter trip one night, after one of the games, the team were frolicking and making a great racket in Frank's room in the hotel. Presently they heard some one hammer a table with a baseball bat; then the authoritative voice of the manager growled out in the sudden silence:

"You fellows have got to stop your d——d swearing; Frank is saying his prayers."

So he was. It was bedtime for men in training, and he had undressed. The hint was followed.

Frank never neglected to read the Bible either. On a similar occasion when a couple of the fellows were playing horse—they are always behaving like infants on these trips—one of them let fly a sofa-cushion which accidentally landed in Frank's lap. He clapped the cushion under his arm before any one else could grab it, then muttered earnestly, "Wait till I finish this chapter and I'll hammer your face with it." And he did.

You understand, of course, that I'm not preaching at you. I'm only telling you kid stories, for you are still a good deal of a kid, though a pseudo-college man. You can draw morals from them or not as best meets your requirements. You know your requirements better than I do. You aren't so bad—in fact, you have behaved yourself pretty well—for a freshman—better than I anticipated in some respects. But you still have a lot to learn about being a college man. So I am just telling you about college men and college kids I have known. I wouldn't preach at you for the world! Go on and finish your translation. I'm going to call on a classmate of mine in the faculty.

Editor's Note—This is the third of Mr. Williams' "Talks." The next will appear in an early number.

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶ A position in hand is worth a dozen in prospect.

¶ Love is a monopoly—but it is not always a trust.

¶ The egotist uses only one I—and that a capital.

¶ One pair of yellow shoes does not make a summer.

¶ Moving is almost as bad as getting married—and most people have to do it oftener.

¶ You cannot take your money beyond the grave, but it will pay for a large, nice epitaph.

¶ It is seldom that a man is as good as his wife tells others he is or as bad as she tells him he is.

What's the Use?

THERE is no discouragement to the good like the triumph of the wicked. It not only shakes their faith but it does worse by stopping their energy. When a man says "What's the use?" he reaches low-water mark.

And yet we find many purposeful people using those hopeless words. They see bosses win in politics, men with doubtful methods get hold of millions, and persons of small merits gain social and official honors, and they settle back disconsolately and exclaim, "What's the use?"

There's a big lot of use. Let us illustrate it by a true story which has never been published. In the dark beginnings of Civil Service reform two young men sat in the office of the Commission at Washington and smiled grimly at the assaults and victories of the spoilsmen. They also dreamed a bit as young men sometimes do. "What a fine thing it would be if you could be Governor of New York!" said one, and the other laughed and replied, "Why not say President of the United States?" But the impossibilities did not dismay them. They looked at the situation and the conditions and agreed to keep on because they were right. And in the course of time the young man did become Governor of New York and he is now President of the United States, and the other fills an important legal office of the Government—appointed by President McKinley and reappointed by his friend Roosevelt.

These young men came in close contact with the bosses, but instead of becoming discouraged they saw the value of the persistence of their enemies and kept at it. Of late we have read much of three men, all "practical politicians," but differing in methods and in individual records and characteristics. No attempt is made here to point out how good or how bad each may be; the comment is on admitted facts.

Senator Quay has stood against some of the ablest, most earnest and most brilliant reform movements in the history of American politics. He was beaten, but he refused to stay beaten. He laid his plans and worked steadily to his ends—and this year he was found in his old seat in the Senate holding all of his old power. His famous and successful contest against a former tariff bill and his warding off of anti-trust legislation under the cover of the Statehood bill illustrated his method—careful planning far ahead and then persistence.

In the case of Senator Gorman the reform forces of both parties got together and wrought one of the most complete overthrows ever known in this country. From one end of the land to the other the political death of Gorman was proclaimed. That was only six years ago. Mr. Gorman seemed to accept the verdict, but he prepared his campaign, worked steadily to his ends, and now we see him once more the leader of his party in the Senate where he once served as a page. It was plan and persistence that did it.

Many thousands of columns could have been printed about Mr. Addicks, of Delaware, and the condemnation of him has been well-nigh universal. There is no need of examining the verdict, but there is a bearing of his case that is not without usefulness. When he began to try to rule a State he met only ridicule—nobody thought he would ever do anything. But he had his plan and his persistence has been one of the most extraordinary exhibitions that any land ever knew. It seems incomprehensible. But it is easily understood—it's the result of keeping at one thing without let or hindrance, of industrious, unswerving indefatigability.

Politicians constantly teach reformers lessons—if the reformers would but learn them. Men of lesser standards who plan, persist and win teach the men of higher standards the value of planning and persisting. It is far easier to triumph in a good cause than in a bad one. The good man always has the better prospect, but if he waits for virtue to bring its own reward or falls comfortably back upon a satisfied conscience he is going to be disappointed. He must fight for results—plan for them, persist until they come.

It is a pretty practical old world and it is inclined to do better for the bad man who plans and persists than for the good man who asks "What's the use?" and quits.

The Man in the Iron Mask

ONE of the most valuable heirlooms belonging to the world in the way of a story is that of the Man in the Iron Mask. It is almost decided now that he was a twin brother of the great Louis, an heir too many of the French crown, and hence, for no fault of his own, sentenced in his cradle never to show his face to a living being, never to be any woman's lover nor any man's friend.

The idea in its unique horror ranks, in literary value, alongside of the stories of the Terror or of the murder of the Salem witches.

But isn't it a fact that many of us commonplace, rational folk make an iron mask for ourselves, right now and here, and button it over our faces and wear it all through our dull, jog-trot lives?

Of course, we all say theoretically that He who puts us and millions of our kinsfolk at one time into this little world means us to scramble up together and to help each other up, so that each man may end life a foot or two higher than he began it. This means a certain esprit de corps among all of us poor climbers—white, yellow and black—a "Yo-heave-ho! All together, boys!" temper, a showing of the best that is in us to the man next us—a grip of the hand to every man within reach.

But some of us have buttoned on these masks and no smile nor kindly shout can come through them.

A good many of us make them out of our Ancestry. I had a great-grandfather who was a Signer, or a Militia Captain under Washington, or a Professor of Greek at Yale. Or he was the first settler in Pottsville, where I now reside. So I make of this mythical ancestor a covering for my real self which shuts me in from my fellow-men. They never know me, nor I them.

There are thousands of Pottsvilles in this country, and in each a foolish little clique, whose pride of birth debars them from the help and comradeship of their neighbors.

Some of us make a mask of our religious creed and stifle under it our lives long. We think that only to us and a few colleagues has been given Eternal Truth, and to the rest of mankind lies in this life and torture in the eternity to come. Nothing shuts a man's life down into such narrow bounds as that delusion. But the mask which most of us smother under is our own importance.

Stop on Broadway or any other place where a great crowd tramps steadily past you and you will find on almost every face the same look.

"I am coming," it seems to say. "I am not like these others. It is I!"

One remembers how Theodore Hook twitched the gown of the pompous Oxford Don. "I beg your pardon," he said, "but are you anybody in particular?"

We laugh at the pompous folk. But we too, perhaps, wear the same look. We are conscious of our standing in Pottsville, or of the novel we have written, or of that militia captain under Washington.

This self-conceit, if we don't take warning, will grow denser as the years go by. It will blind and choke us as the mask of iron could not blind or choke the prisoner of Mont St. Michel.

Under it neither wife nor child nor friend will ever know us as we are. He—the prisoner—was buried in his mask. Shall we, too, wear ours—out yonder into the dark?

Are We "the People"?

"SOON to guide the human race"—"Speedily the financial centre of the world"—"Before long the centre of education in all branches of science and art"—these are a few specimens from one day's installment of foreign bouquets for your Uncle Sam. Nowadays you can scarce see his smiling face for the high-heaped floral tributes from far and near, all testifying to his power, wisdom, genius and bank account. Ambassador Choate, journeying in the land of the sources of the Nile, finds the natives eagerly buying handkerchiefs of German manufacture stamped with the Stars and Stripes and the portraits of Washington, Lincoln, Cleveland and McKinley.

There isn't a doubt about it—but who are "we"? And why are "we" "the people"?

A calm, dispassionate answer to the first question may tend to restrain us from getting what the Germans call Katzenjammer, the French the grandiose mania, and the Americans the "swelled head." And a calm, dispassionate answer to the second question may prevent us from pointing our noses so high that our high-stepping feet will wander far from the path, far into the bogs and swamps.

"Triumphant America" certainly doesn't mean each and every one of our seventy-eight millions. For instance, it doesn't include the admitted idiots and lunatics, the registered paupers and parasites, the caged criminals, the six million illiterates. In a sense, it includes the twenty-five to thirty million children, for they exert a tremendous influence upon the grown people. But in no sense does it include the whittlers on dry-goods boxes, the barroom loafers, the fellows that listen all day long for the whistle to blow, those who are the first to be mentioned whenever there is talk of cutting down the force. It doesn't include those of our statesmen who spend their time in promoting corrupt jobs or in hunting places for lazy heelers. It doesn't include the doctors who reach their high-water mark for professional knowledge on the day they graduate, or the lawyers who lie and cheat and procure injustice for the sake of fees.

Most of these—even the idiots and criminals—do a little something toward progress. This world is so happily ordered that it is impossible for one man to do much harm or to avoid doing some good; and one of the greatest forces for good is the power of a bad example. Still, it isn't our bad examples that make us get on and earn us these smothers of flowery compliment. "We" doesn't cover any of them.

Thus it appears that when an American says "We" are "the people!" he may be taking wide, not to say wild, liberties with the word "we." It may be that he has made of himself such a spectacle as does the rooster crowing when the hen lays an egg. It is foolish enough for a political party to throw out its chest and say "we" over what the people have done without any appreciable assistance from it, perhaps in spite of it. But the folly becomes pitifully fantastic when indulged in by a man who is a mere mouthing sluggard, or is like that clown in the French circus who is always hindering everybody while making the most elaborate efforts to help.

As for the other question—Why are we at present so admirably ensconced?—the answer to that brings instantly before us what Europe would call our humble origin. We are working men and working women, the sons and daughters of working people. And just as soon as one of us becomes ashamed of his origin or of his own past, becomes infected with the cheap and silly vulgarisms that Europe is always thrusting upon us, just so soon does he or she begin to fall behind the procession.

Most of the alleged perils from our "foreign element" are fanciful, fantastic. One that has attracted little attention is genuine. There is danger lest this vast mass of foreigners, coming from lands where class distinctions were centuries old, should, before it is absorbed, impress upon America the class idea. And the class idea is our heel of Achilles.

Some of us are tall and others short, some straight and others crooked, some strong, others feeble; some of us run, others walk, others snail it. But all, all have their feet upon the same level of the common earth. And America's worst enemy is he—or she—who by word or look encourages another to think otherwise. Head as high as you please; but feet always upon the common ground, never upon anybody's shoulders or neck, even though he be weak or willing.

The Earning Power of MONEY

JUDGMENT in handing determines the earning power of money. It is better to place savings in a sound bank where they will earn a fair rate of interest than to invest them in schemes where they may earn 8 to 10 per cent. now, and perhaps nothing later. A safe income and safety of principal are the two vital points.

4 % Interest on Savings

This bank originated and developed the banking by mail system. It has depositors in every State in the Union and in many foreign countries, and pays 4 per cent. interest, compounded twice a year, on all savings accounts. Safety of principal is guaranteed by capital, surplus and profits of over $800,000.00, and by careful, conservative management.

The following table shows how rapidly savings grow with 4 per cent. compound interest added:

Weekly Savings	For 5 Years	For 10 Years	For 20 Years	For 40 Years
.25	$ 73	$ 192	$ 403	$ 1,294
.50	146	324	806	2,588
1.00	293	650	1,614	5,177
2.00	585	1,301	3,228	10,355
5.00	1,462	3,252	8,070	25,888

YOU CAN BANK BY MAIL

Deposits are received in any amount from $1 up, and may be sent by registered mail, post-office order, express money order or by draft or check on your local bank.

Our illustrated booklet and full particulars will be sent to any one interested. Mention The Saturday Evening Post.

LITTLE STORIES OF "STEVE" CRANE

By Corwin Knapp Linson

I WAS closely associated with Stephen Crane during the years just preceding his success, when we both had our feet in the same Slough of Despond. We parted —for a season, I thought—when he went to Athens at the time of the Greek War, after a last evening together in New York.

My first meeting with him was in the winter of 1892-3. One Sunday afternoon, Mr. Louis C. Senger, a cousin who was one of his intimates, brought him to my studio in the old building on West Thirtieth Street and Broadway. It was a dreary day, and the gray light filtered in through the cobwebby panes of the great sidelight, finding us in a kind of half-gloom. He talked little, sitting on a divan quietly smoking cigarettes. He impressed me as an unusual individuality, at first reserved, but soon expanding in the warmth of our comradeship.

It was a good beginning. His long rain-ulster became a familiar object, for those were slushy, drizzly days, and the winter air was oftener sleety with cold rain than fluffy with feathery snow. One day a pocket contained a yellow-covered book—the Maggie, which was left with me. It was read with enthusiasm and immediately clamored for. His vigorous English and deep human sympathy fairly took me by storm. The book was resigned with a smile. "There are heaps of them left; the public isn't crazy about having them."

And then its history came out: how no publisher would take it, so that he had had it printed at his own expense; how it had been turned down by the newsdealers, icily received by prominent clergymen who did not preach that way, and how two eminent literary men alone had stood by him with encouragement. Afterward I saw the yellow stacks of unsold books in his rooms.

My place was a black den in those days, and my affairs harmonized, so that it was quite a congenial retreat for Crane. It was his daily habit to come and compare notes. When the news-stands declared war, he became savagely caustic; when such men as Howells and Garland, who were to him the last word in American literature, called his book a great performance, he was seriously elate, happy beyond expression. I have often wondered if Mr. Howells knew the deep joy with which his good opinion filled Crane.

His facility used to astonish me. Sitting on my couch, rings of gray smoke circling about him, a pad on his knee, he would turn out a complete story in a half-hour. Sometimes it was a fragment that would be laid by for future use. Several sparkling sketches were invented and written in that atmosphere of melancholy, while I sat at my easel dabbling at a drawing and wondering how a new illustrator could get in his "wedge."

His Feverish Work and Keen Insight

A visit to his rooms one morning discovered him in undress with a wet towel turban-like about his head, feverishly writing. He waved me to a seat, and soon handed me the first pages of a story. "Been at it most of the night, and it's nearly finished." It appeared long after in one of the papers. Its characters were taken from the class that furnishes cheap entertainment at the seaside resorts, and it was slight enough as a tale. But what amazed me was the vivid drawing of these people, his picturing of their life and environment, his insight into their motives and habits, months after he could have been in touch with them at all, revealing keenest observation and understanding. One might say that like qualities are the common equipment of the artist, but he had them in an uncommon way.

Crane had many loyal friends then, but, unfortunately, they were as poorly situated as himself: young doctors working out their hospital apprenticeship, boyish reporters and artists for obvious reasons unspoiled by prosperity; my cousin, who was none of these but equally at home with all; a half-dozen as ardent souls as ever banded together, widely scattered as to domiciles but easily mobilized for whatever there was afoot, to whom economy was at once a bugbear and a necessity. There were joyous days, and when fortune once sent us oysters and a beefsteak the notable occasion was duly celebrated.

It was about that time that he had a story of two men who went bathing on the Jersey coast, and, in toying with a derelict raft, were carried out to sea, picked up by a little coast schooner, and taken to New York. He asked me to illustrate it "on spec.," and as I had no other work to do I went through it from title to tailpiece, and never had more fun with anything.

There was no editor hounding me for urgent haste, the author was delighted as things progressed, posed himself for the tall man—he was thin enough!—stuffed a pillow in the clothes of a friend for the fat man (it was funny to see that pillow swelling from beneath a tightly-fitting bathing-suit), and I grimaced in a glass for the bath-ticket seller in his box.

When finished, the whole thing was sent to a magazine, which had already printed a sketch of his. Then I went camping up in Ramapo.

When I returned, the package had also reappeared, having been "considered." for most of the summer. Crane had reported it accepted, and we were correspondingly happy, but somehow it lost its bearings.

The after fate of our effort was unknown, except that it disappeared in the mazy offices of one of the magazines, and never came to the surface.

Evolving the Red Badge of Courage

In the spring of '93 Crane used to spend hours in my place rummaging through old periodicals, poring over the Civil War articles. I did not then grasp his drift, nor did he explain his interest in them. But he was sounding, trying to fathom the inwardness of war through the impressions on record, as I afterward understood. He did express some impatience with the writers, I remember.

"I wonder that some of those fellows don't tell how they felt in those scraps. They spout enough of what they did, but they're as emotionless as rocks."

He was evolving the Red Badge of Courage.

He had, also, several short sketches in hand which he casually called the Baby Stories. I had three of them in camp that summer to study for pictures, but nothing came of them. For lucid analysis of the very young human heart I never saw their like. The winter following was a hard one for Crane. It was not honey for me, exactly, but it was growing kindlier, while for him it presented a face of stone. He was now in the old League building on Twenty-third Street, rooming with several young illustrators and newspaper artists.

One morning early, after a blizzardy night, I found him in bed. He looked haggard. He was alone, the others being presumably in pursuit of the art editors.

Pulling a manuscript from mysterious seclusion, he tossed it to me. It was the sketch, The Men in the Storm, suggested by Mr. Garland. He had been all night at it, out in the storm in line with the hungry men, studying them; then inside, writing it.

This was the period of his tramp studies, written for a press syndicate. He disappeared from view for days, and was suddenly dug up looking as if he had

LINEN UNDERWEAR

Helps Make Life Pleasant

"Sold Under Binding Guarantee."

Warm in Winter, cool in Summer—comfortable always. The ideal underwear.

Linen is cleanly; boiling water doesn't shrink it. That's one comfort. Not so with wool.

The mesh weave encloses a layer of air, and air is a non-conductor of heat; keeps the outside heat out in Summer, and the body heat in in Winter. Another comfort.

Belfast Mesh Linen Underwear instantly absorbs perspiration and dries quickly—that keeps the bodily temperature even, there's no danger of "taking cold." Colds are not comfortable.

Our fabric is made both "Natural" linen and "White." We recommend the "Natural." It is more durable and absorbent and equally grateful to the skin.

Send for Samples of the Fabric and our Free Book

It is handsome and convincing. It goes into the subject thoroughly and explodes the "wool for warmth" theory in short order. It is designed for thinking people who desire comfort with health. The only forcible objection to the other mesh underwears has been that they "wear out too quickly." We guarantee that Belfast Mesh will wear to the satisfaction of the purchaser or refund money.

Sold by all dealers, or sent direct by mail if your dealer won't supply it.

lived in a grave. All this time he had inhabited the tramp lodging-houses nights, and camped on the down-town park benches days. With grim delight he related how an old acquaintance had passed him a foot away, as he sat with a genuine hobo in front of the City Hall, and how the police had eyed his borrowed rags askance, or indicated with official hand that another bench needed dusting.

One evening he came to me, bringing several loose sheets of manuscript.

"What do you think I have been doing?"

"I can imagine anything, Steve."

"I've been writing—poetry!"

"Great Scott! let me see."

Well as I knew him, I was not prepared for what came. The sheets of legal-cap were handed over, and I read those marvelous short poems. I did not know how good they were. I confessed that they were something new to me, but that they made me see pictures, great pictures.

"Do they, honest?" delightedly.

I added that they moved me profoundly.

"Is that so?" seriously.

"Indeed they do, Steve, they're immense! How did you ever think of them?"

"They came."

That seemed to be the way of it, they just "came." And that was my introduction to his new character. I have two of those poems now.

One, happening to be there, seeing some of them and handing them back with, "I don't know much about poetry," called forth an energetic protest after he left.

"I know every one can't like them, but I hate to give a man a chance to hit me in the neck with an ax!"

It was not very long after that that an "Authors' Reading" was given, and my cousin Louis went with me, for some things from The Black Riders (still unpublished) were to be read. Far from reading his own work, at the idea of which he was aghast, Crane could not be induced even to go and hear—"would not be dragged by the neck"—so in dread was he of a misunderstanding of his work. He could stand up to adverse criticism like a catcher behind the bat, or retort to a gibe, giving better than he received—for his wit had a keen edge, and he was a master of repartee—but cold indifference was the "ax in the neck." The war of the newsdealers upon his Maggie was unjust, and he scorned them, but the slight put upon his book by the clergymen to whom he sent it chilled his blood.

So he awaited our report in his room. We made it glowing, for the audience was enthusiastic and the "Lines" had been most effectively read by Mr. Barry.

Jeered at by Friendly Companions

As to Crane's environment at that time, his statement of it could hardly have been greatly exaggerated. The fellows with whom he lived used to receive his verses as good material for the comic papers, for they jeered at everything. It is the attitude of youth. Once, as we sat by ourselves amid the confusion of tables laden with all the litter of writing and drawing tools, unwashed coffee-cups, newspaper drawings, tobacco, bread, pipes, while about us were crazy chairs, unkept beds, disorderly trunks and shelves, and room-long reach of quaking stovepipe—everything at war with everything else—he said to me:

"Confound their cheek; they even parody my verse!" Then he laughed and pointed to a pinned-up squib on the wall, with a caricature of himself above it. It was a parody, and clever, so like his style that he might have been its author.

"They make me ill—but they don't mean it, and I get my innings! They're a husky lot."

There were at least five of them, all on the war-path. More than once I was one of the roomful of "Indians" whose vision of things was distorted in the dim haze of smoke.

Something of this life of his is reflected in Third Violet.

We knew all the Cheap-John restaurants together. There was one to which many congenial spirits flitted on Saturday nights; where absolute liberty of emotion was allowed, where a tableful could break out into song and wild gayety without annoying any one particularly, where there was much confusion of tongues, where bad wine took the place of "draw one," and where the waiters conjured the knives, forks and spoons from the depths of cavernous breeches' pockets and wiped them on their sleeves! There could be no etiquette in a place like that, except that of good humor. We Americanized its French name into the Buffalo Mode, and once each week we carried our troubles to its murky atmosphere and joyous company. The life of our table—always the middle one of the room—was Crane, and the cheeriest sallies were from his lips.

I had almost forgotten the "towel painting." During that camping summer in the Ramapo backwoods, I had my only two yards of painting canvas slung on a line over my hammock like a roof, to shed the rain, and the next best thing was to make more. The only form of linen up there was in the shape of coarse towels, which I used singly, or sewed together, painting over a coating of glue. They did very well until one of them got rained on, when my hardly secured study flaked off in great spots. But my picture of that year ('94) in the Society was painted on one of those towels!

That summer we were sent to do the mines at Scranton. It was Crane's first assignment from one of the magazines, but he had not enough money to pay his fare from New York. Luckily, I had enough just then to see us through, and we undertook it joyfully. We were expecting after that to do the sea-divers, going down in diving rigs—but it did not happen.

After this, I saw less and less of him, for in '95 he made an extended tour through the West for a press syndicate, going into Mexico, and not returning for some months. A note or two only, from the West and New Orleans, were the only signs I had of his existence.

His Vivid Brilliancy in Talking

But he grew rich in material on this trip. He suddenly appeared one evening, and held me breathless and intent with tales of adventure. One of them I saw afterward in print, but his vivid telling was so much more effective than even his strenuous pen-picture, that the written story seemed to lose color as I contrasted the two in my memory. That his luminous phrasing was not a trick was never more evident than then. It was simply Crane.

His speech was free from the danger that his writing ran, of weakening with repetition. Each scintillation eclipsed the last, but left a complete impression of delight.

He brought back a half-dozen opals, some with the lambent flame of the sunset in their fiery depths. He freely gave me the choice of the lot. I took a little one that flashed at me with the gleam of a rainbow. Crane laughingly added a fine water opal to it. The next morning he said:

"It's a good thing you came in for a deal yesterday, for the newspaper Indians gave me a dinner last night, and they got my pretty pebbles!"

I frankly regretted that I had made no better use of my opportunity!

And now—'96—our meetings grew less frequent. He spent much time away from New York, and I also was absent some months abroad. Finally he sent for a box of manuscript that had been some time in my care, and soon after unexpectedly showed himself at my door, just before his departure for Athens and the Græco-Turkish war. He was full of his prospective trip. It was a new phase of life, actual war, and the excitement of it was upon him. It was late when we parted, and it was my final "good-by." Almost his last words were references to his almost native Sullivan County (New York) which was also my own, provoked by some inane remarks of men at a nearby table at dinner.

"If they only knew it as we do, eh," he said laconically, "they couldn't make such brilliant asses of themselves before old inhabitants."

After that, only occasional reports came, of his living in England, of his presence in Cuba. From a brother with the army at Santiago, I heard of him.

"I met your friend Crane at Santiago. He's going to Manila, he says. He's a hustler, isn't he?"

And then a long blank, until, living in Paris, I heard of his illness in England, and before I could realize his condition the news of his death came.

It is inevitable that there must exist a nipping regret at the cutting off of a brilliant individuality in its early development. His was a cometlike career. And undeniably erratic and irresponsible in much as he was, he was lovable to a degree, daring and chivalrous, generous as the air, compelling a genuinely warm affection from those who best knew him; and for his genius I sometimes felt not a little awe, as for a power mysterious and unaccountable.

The Speaker's Prompter

By Linsley F. TerBush

An Inconspicuous Official Who Passes on All Questions of Parliamentary Procedure, and Really Directs the Conduct of the Business of the Nation.

THERE frequently appears in the printed reports of the proceedings of Congress the statement that "the Speaker ruled" this or that way on the parliamentary point under discussion. In order to be strictly correct these reports should read, "Mr. Hinds ruled," for very few of the parliamentary questions which rise in the course of debate in the National House of Representatives are decided by the Speaker. Asher C. Hinds settles the parliamentary point at issue and the Speaker merely repeats, parrotlike, what he has been prompted to say by the parliamentary authority of the House. Nine times out of ten, yes, ninety-nine times out of one hundred, the Speaker doesn't even try to improve upon the language used by Mr. Hinds, but with phonographic accuracy repeats to the House in a loud voice what Mr. Hinds has said to him sotto voce.

Mr. Hinds appears in the Congressional Directory as the clerk at the Speaker's table. In truth he is the parliamentary helmsman of the House of Representatives, and the presiding officer of the House would no more think of taking up the consideration of a bill upon which there is liable to be debate without Mr. Hinds standing at the side of his desk than would the captain of a vessel attempt to enter a dangerous harbor without first taking aboard an experienced pilot. Hinds is asserted to be the foremost parliamentarian in this country, if not in the entire world. Not only is he familiar with the rules and usages of our domestic deliberative bodies but he has an intimate acquaintance with those of the leading foreign nations, and when a point comes up for which there has been no precedent in the National Congress he generally is able to find some ground upon which to base his action out of the parliamentary history of the foreign governments.

Mr. Hinds is not on exhibition as one of the wonders of Congress, and, although he directs the Speaker, he never puts himself within the circle of the limelight which is constantly kept upon the presiding officer of the House. In fact, he stands just outside of its glare where the shadow is thickest. At the rap of the Speaker's gavel that calls the House to order at noon every legislative day during a session of Congress, Mr. Hinds quietly takes his place at the right of the Speaker's desk. There he stands throughout the proceedings, keeping an alert watch on every movement made on the floor. Usually before the Speaker has grasped the meaning of a motion or a point of order, Hinds has comprehended it, decided the procedure to be followed and told the Speaker what to do. He makes no show with all this. To the uninitiated it would appear that he is merely a member of the House, or an employee who for the time has nothing to do and is amusing himself by watching the debate. It takes a close scrutiny to catch him prompting the Speaker because he scarcely moves his lips in enunciating in his low, distinct voice what the Speaker shall say.

A Friend and Pupil of Tom Reed

Asher C. Hinds is a product of the same State which gave Thomas B. Reed, another famous parliamentarian, to Congress. In fact, it was Mr. Reed who was responsible for Hinds being there at present. In 1890 Mr. Reed brought him to Washington as his clerk. Mr. Hinds served with Mr. Reed's committee during the Fifty-first, Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, and in the Fifty-fourth Congress was made clerk at the Speaker's desk. Mr. Reed, while Speaker, was very particular about the parliamentary proceedings of the House. It is said that there was not one Representative in the entire membership who could handle the gavel to his liking when he desired to leave the chair. Consequently it was a great relief to him to have at his right elbow the only man in

THE WEBER PIANO CO., 108 Fifth Ave., N. Y. City

Washington in whose parliamentary ability Mr. Reed had absolute confidence. Members who were called upon by the Speaker to preside over the House in his absence or over the committee of the whole House were instructed to accept Mr. Hinds' rulings on all parliamentary matters without question. The convenience of having a Speaker's prompter who was almost unerring was soon recognized by the leaders in Congress, and after Mr. Reed's resignation Mr. Henderson retained Mr. Hinds in his important position, and Mr. Cannon has already said that he will do likewise in the coming Congress over which he expects to preside.

Mr. Hinds is a natural parliamentarian. Just as some people have a knack for dealing with mathematics so he delights in parliamentary problems. It is as much pleasure for Mr. Hinds to unravel a complicated parliamentary situation as it is for the ordinary man to follow the plot of an interesting novel. He was born in the little town of Benton, Maine, February 6, 1863, and his first experience with a parliamentary body was twenty-one years later when he was sent to Augusta to report the proceedings of the Maine Legislature as a newspaper correspondent. He soon found that parliamentary situations that stumped the members of the Legislature were simple problems to him, so he began, at first for amusement, to devote his leisure time to following out whatever parliamentary tangles came up to their logical conclusions. Afterward he took up the subject seriously and all of his spare time was devoted to the study of parliamentary law and parliamentary history. Before he had finished his third, and last, session as a legislative correspondent he had acquired an enviable reputation as an authority on parliamentary law. Mr. Reed was a specialist on the same question and one day he engaged in a controversy with a friend over a parliamentary point. The friend finally suggested that the decision be left to young Hinds.

"Who's Hinds?" asked the man upon whom afterward devolved the duty of counting a quorum in the House of Representatives.

"He's a newspaper man who has made himself the best parliamentarian in Maine," rejoined the friend.

Mr. Reed sought out Hinds and soon after their meeting offered to take him to Washington as his clerk. Before their friendship ended Hinds had pursued his studies of parliamentary law so far that Mr. Reed frequently and frankly admitted himself to be outclassed by his clerk.

The True Importance of the Position

Mr. Hinds had been at his post at the Speaker's desk for nearly four years before the House became duly impressed with the importance of his position. It was just before the war with Spain was declared that this came about. Speaker Reed's aversion to the mere mention of the possibility of war was well known to the members. Many of his own party were ruffled by his obstinacy and only waited the time to join with the Democrats and, figuratively speaking, toss their presiding officer in a blanket. One day there was a hot debate. Senator Bailey, of Texas, who was then the Democratic leader on the floor, had engaged the House in a parliamentary puzzle which became more and more involved as the debate proceeded. The time seemed auspicious for the tossing to begin. Speaker Reed unexpectedly made a ruling which, if maintained, would put a stop to the disorder. It was questioned by Republicans and Democrats alike, but he cited precedents in such profusion that the House was forced to accept his ruling as good parliamentary law. Later it was discovered that Hinds had led the Speaker out of the darkness and that by his thorough system of indexing his store of precedents he had been able to supply Mr. Reed, at a moment's notice, with the authority for his seemingly arbitrary action. Congress immediately became possessed of a desire to have Mr. Hinds' precedents at its disposal, and a bill was passed appropriating $3500 as remuneration to Hinds for preparing them for publication. It was a short task for one so familiar with his subject and the same year Hinds' Precedents were placed on the desk of every Congressman. They are seldom used in debate, however, for the book treats the subject so completely that it would take the average Representative a lifetime to become sufficiently familiar with them to make use of them in the haste of debate. Consequently most of the members rely upon Mr. Hinds for their parliamentary pointers, and in this way he has become not only the Speaker's prompter but the prompter of every member who takes part in debate.

"Uncle Joe" Cannon, who will be the next Speaker of the House of Representatives, does not pretend to be a skilled parliamentarian. His is a mind which has an aptitude for figures rather than points of order, but Mr. Hinds is in good health, and as the House has just raised his salary is content to remain in his present position, so Mr. Cannon has no misgivings regarding his ability to successfully preside during debate. The increase in salary which Mr. Hinds received this session was most deserved. He formerly received $2200 and the recent raise granted him raises it to $3600. In addition, he is paid $1000 a year for preparing the digest and the manual of the House of Representatives, so that he earns $4600 a year, nearly the salary paid to a member of Congress.

During the last years of the late Thomas B. Reed as Speaker the Maine statesman dearly loved to engage in a parliamentary dispute with his prompter. Mr. Reed would frequently go out of his way to question a ruling made by Mr. Hinds, and debate would be delayed while the two argued the point.

According to the House employees whose duties keep them close to the Speaker's desk, where they could listen to these arguments, the controversy generally ended by Mr. Reed accepting Mr. Hinds' position and in so ruling to the House.

In Lazy Man's Land

WHILE soil physicists sent out from Washington are studying the great possibilities of the hemp industry in the Philippines, an official in the office of the Supervisor of the Province of Albay has written to Professor F. Lamson-Scribner, at Manila, Chief of the Insular Bureau of Agriculture, calling his attention to an alleged agricultural phenomenon of a remarkable character.

When a plunger of Anislag wood is used to make holes for the planting of hemp, the quality produced is softer and of far more durable fibre than that obtained from plants grown in holes made by other instruments, particularly of iron.

"It may be thought," added the official correspondent, "that this is nothing but an incredible superstition, but the most successful planters in the Philippines certify to its correctness."

This curious statement bears the indorsement of Ladislens Szily, Supervisor of the Province of Albay, and of a number of old hemp buyers and planters of the islands.

The American soil experts in the Philippines are accepting nothing for granted, but are subjecting every detail of the hemp industry to scientific tests. Whatever virtues inhere in Anislag wood as a hole-digger for hemp plants remain to be determined. In the mean time the soil physicists hold out encouragement to Americans to start hemp farms in the Philippines. Although over 111,000,000 kilos of hemp were exported during the last fiscal year, the value of which to Manila shippers was $14,453,110, the industry has only begun. At present the crudest methods are employed in cultivating the plant, and, through the primitive methods of harvesting, Government experts say, more than twenty-five per cent. of hemp is wasted.

Notwithstanding that the sale of hemp constitutes the greatest source of wealth in many parts of the Archipelago, large tracts of hemp farms, particularly in Sorsogon and other provinces of Luzon, are left unharvested and, are fast reverting into jungles. Other sections where wild hemp grows could be readily converted into prosperous hemp farms, and in fact, vast areas not now under cultivation would afford fruitful fields for hemp culture.

Manila hemp, or abacá, as it is called almost exclusively in the Philippine trade, is not identical with the hemp grown in America and other parts of the world. The botanical name of the Manila hemp plant is musa textilis. It is a species of the banana family. It thrives best on Philippine mountains near the seacoast. Many Philippine hemp farmers do not find it necessary to cultivate the ground. Plows, hoes and spades are not needed. A man starting a hemp farm merely clears away the underbrush and the largest trees, the rest being left for shade.

Three years from the date of planting the quantity of hemp harvested is only a question of how many natives the planters can secure to cut the plants and extract the fibre.

50 Sets of the Best Shakespeare
For Saturday Evening Post Readers

Our Half-Price Club edition of the International Shakespeare is almost exhausted, owing to the large number of orders received from readers of Shakespeare who want the best and most satisfactory edition. SATURDAY EVENING POST readers have shown such an interest in the edition since the beginning of the sale that we have reserved fifty sets, which will be held and sold only to those who send us the coupon printed in this advertisement. This means that, if you are prompt, you can secure a set at less than half price and on easy terms of payment, but if you delay sending your order, the edition will be exhausted and we cannot supply you with a set except at the full retail prices. This edition is unique in the fullness and accuracy of its notes and explanatory matter. It represents more than two years' work on the part of a trained editorial corps, and it is destined to remain the best and most accurate edition.

Sets in 13 Illustrated Volumes — 7,000 Pages — Size, 8 x 5½ inches

The International Edition

What This Edition Is

The International Edition is founded on the famous Cambridge text, which has been for forty years the standard text of Shakespeare. To this text have been added Prefaces; Critical Comments taken from the works of eminent Shakespearian scholars; Glossaries defining every difficult word; and Explanatory and Critical Notes. There are over 200 illustrations, many of them being full-page chromatic pages printed in ten to twelve colors. Included with the set is a complete Life of Shakespeare by Dr. Israel Gollancz, with critical estimates of Shakespeare's genius by Walter Bagehot, Leslie Stephen, and Thomas Spencer Baynes. Shakespeare's works — everything he wrote — are given complete, including the Sonnets and Poems. The volumes are 8x5½ inches in size, and are elegantly bound in cloth or half-leather, stamped in gold.

Why You Should Own It

No library, however large it may be, is complete without Shakespeare, though a library is sometimes complete with Shakespeare alone, for in his plays can be found all the great elemental truths that have moved the world and all the basic ideas that underlie civilization. Through his pages move two hundred and forty-six characters — embodying every form that virtue or vice, nobility or meanness, education or ignorance, can assume. He is the most interesting story-teller the human race has ever produced — and the greatest philosopher of all ages as well. His plays form a part of every scheme of liberal education. You are going to buy a good set of Shakespeare some day. Why not buy the best edition NOW while you may get it at half price and on easy terms of payment?

Entire Sets Sent on Approval

We are so confident that this edition will please the most exacting buyer, that we are willing to send complete sets for examination. But prompt action is necessary if you wish to obtain one of the remaining sets reserved for readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. At the present prices a set of this edition is a rare book bargain. The prices are $22.00 for a set in half-leather and $18.00 for a set in cloth — about one-half the regular subscription prices. You may pay in little payments of

$1.00 a Month

To be sure of one of the remaining sets, you had better cut off the coupon and mail it to us to-day. We will send you a set for leisurely inspection (express paid by us), and if it is not satisfactory, it may be returned at our expense without costing you a cent.

Men Who Do Things

"The great want of the day is the man who can put his ideas into practice."

This thought in an editorial of The Saturday Evening Post of February 28 is the basis of a series of articles on men who have learned how to put their ideas into practice.

HERE is a true story that will interest every ambitious man and woman.

A man of thirty-two (we'll call him John Smith for the present) had lived all his life in a New England city without making any special stir in the community. He had been an office man, and a good one, too. But he had about reached the limit of that profession when he began to draw a salary of $18 a week. He might have been drawing that salary yet, but he was always looking for something better, and a couple of years ago he made a contract with a carriage company and began to sell carriages. He made more money than he had ever made before. But of course he wasn't satisfied. He could only see a limited number of people and consequently his business was limited.

He sold lots of carriages but he felt that if he could only talk to more people he could do more business and earn more money.

How was he to manage it? Why couldn't he state his case on paper and reach thousands of people instead of scores?

But that would be advertising; and he did not know anything about advertising.

One day he read the following advertisement:

"LEARN TO WRITE ADVERTISEMENTS

ER THIS ADVERTISE-rely that we will teach by mail; thoroughly, ou will then know why hroughout the country man.' You will know why our graduates are earning $25 to $100 per week. You will know why you should entrust your advertising education in the hands of the oldest, largest and most substantial institution of its kind in the world. You will also know why the majority of our students are taking the instructions through the recommendations of friends who have previously taken the course. Write for our 64 page prospectus and bundle of affidavits SENT FREE."

He wrote to the institution asking for particulars.

When the literature came he examined it. He arranged to begin the study by mail. Every lesson he applied to his own business.

He soon saw that he was taught how to put his arguments on paper so that other people would understand them as he did. That was what he was looking for. Now he could reach out into a broader field. He became enthusiastic.

He had sold a carriage to a New York business man who lived in his own town. The man was a heavy advertiser. One day Smith went down to the depot to take the train for New York. The business man was there, too. Smith managed to get in the same seat with him. Pretty soon the business man began to make up an advertisement. Smith became interested. The business man said he had to make up his own advertisements because he had no one in his concern who knew how.

"That is just my business," said Smith; "why don't you let me do it?" The business man was skeptical. Smith was persistent. Before they left the train Smith had some of the literature relating to the man's business and the leading facts to be presented in the next advertisement. Smith also had the business man's promise that if he ran the advertisement Smith was to write he would pay him $15.00 for it.

That night was a busy one for Smith. He studied the literature and the field to be reached by the man's business. The next day he mailed the advertisement which he had prepared. The next Sunday it appeared in the New York papers.

A day or two later the two again met at the depot. Without a word the business man drew two ten dollar bills from his pocket and handed them to Smith. He told him to keep it all; "The advertisement was worth it."

Then he wanted to hire Smith to write his advertisements.

What salary would he take?

Fifty dollars a week.

All the way into the city they talked the matter over. Finally, it was arranged that Smith should take charge of writing his advertisements. He was to receive $50.00 a week. That was two years ago. Smith was soon advanced to the management of the New York Office.

Smith's real name is Frank R. Fuller, manager for L. E. Pike & Co., of New York City, one of the biggest concerns of its kind in the world.

NOTE—If the readers of The Saturday Evening Post write to the original school of advertising, PAGE-DAVIS CO., Suite 418—90 Wabash Avenue, Chicago, they will receive, free, an interesting prospectus setting forth the advantage of an advertising education. A most profitable and fascinating business for ambitious men and women.

The Moving Wheels of Pulverhook

PERMANENTLY SETTLED

By Hayden Carruth

IT WAS one day reported about town that Mr. Milo Bush was ill. For two days he had not appeared at his accustomed haunts. Arriving at his domicile I was relieved by being met at the door by the worthy citizen himself, though the next moment I regretted to hear that he had been kept at home by sickness in the family. But even this new cause of concern was speedily mitigated, to a certain extent, by the further information that the member of his family who was indisposed was a pointer pup. I would then have taken my departure, but Mr. Bush refused to listen to the idea and dragged me in. I understood his object but too well. Without preface or apology he launched upon the following narrative:

There was old Pulverhook. Colonel Pulverhook we used to call him, 'cause he come from North Carolina, or thereabouts. Said he did, anyhow. Reckon he did, prob'bly. Too lazy to lie, old Pulverhook was. Remember the day well that he struck town. Walked over from the depot carrying a carpet-sack big's a blacksmith's bellows.

"Reckon the strange party sleeps in his carpet-bag nights," says Abner Blackmark, a-sizing him up. "It's all right, I s'pose, if he likes it, but give me a snug single room."

Well, he come into the Headquarters House and sot his carpet-sack down in one corner and backed up to the stove and sort o' went to sleep standing up. Then pretty soon he dragged open one eye by main strength, h'isted his chin a little and says he: "The wheels of the kyar of scientific progress move steadily on'ard, though deeply embedded in the yielding sands of conservertism"—just like that he says.

"Old man," says Abner, in a kind voice, "put the kyar in your grip and carry it acrost."

"Sah?" says the old party.

"Pry the kyar up with a rail and put snow-shoes on the wheels," says Abner in a gentle tone; "don't take on so—you're amongst friends."

The old man settled down in our midst and made himself right to home. Lived here three years and never done a stroke of work. Used to mainly set on a dry-goods box in front of Shanks's and drum his heels on the side with a holler sound, and think and draw pictures of flying machines and perpetual-motion dinguses on a shingle.

And all the time the old gent was living on tick, reg'lar. "Charge it!" was his word at all the stores.

And the storekeepers done it, though mostly they charged it to one of us good sure-pay customers. Bymeby we seen that his game was played out. We talked it over and decided that he was too expensive a luxury. So that evening we dropped round to where he was living, and says Jap Bingerford:

"Colonel Pulverhook, as Cheerman of the Committee on Local Incumbrances, it is my onfortunate dooty to inform you that it is the

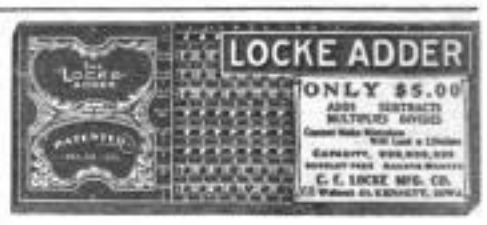
You Can't Fail

If There's Any "Go" in You

In a rut? Then get out of it. Learn advertising, the new profession: it's uncrowded; it pays well; competent men and women are in demand. The Helms course of ad-writing has been successfully taught by mail for the past two years. The graduates, without a single exception, endorse it. They're all quite willing to do this, because they're all in good positions, obtained and held because

They Know the Business



This course is not taught by "form letters." Every lesson is prepared and corrected by Mr. Helms himself, and is accompanied by a letter personally dictated by him. He has no assistants. Consequently, but two hundred pupils can be taught at one time. Only thirty more will be accepted now. If you're willing to give up about three hours a week, and to ask questions about whatever features of the work are not clearly understood, you may be one of the thirty, and you'll be equipped in four to six months. Only earnest men and women are wanted in this course. Their instructor will be no less conscientious in his work.

Most Cloth Brushes are made with flag ends of bristles, very soft and flimsy, which have to be trimmed off flat with a machine cutter.

The result is a smooth surface which slides over the material to be brushed without penetrating the fibres of the cloth.

sense of this yer community that you go out from us."

"Alars, I am not going to be oscarcized, am I?" says the old man.

"Fur from anything so crool," says Jap; "you must simply get out—that's all."

"But how?" goes on the old man.

"We have made it our pleasant priv'lege to provide the ve-hick-el," says Jap. "A oak rail, Colonel. Fetch on the rail, boys!"

"Alars, this is too much!" says the Colonel. "I thought to leave your hospiterable city in a flying machine for which I have drawred plans, and not on a rail, relic of them dark ages. But the wheels of the kyar of scientific progress move steadily on'ard though deeply embedded in the yielding sands of conservertism!"

Then we started acrost the prehayrie with him, we a-singing the pop'lar songs of the day. When we got out about two miles we sot him down and prepared to take our leave. The exercises were short and simple, as befitted the occasion. We then returned to town. Some said he would be back the next morning, but he wasn't.

"He has took the hint," says Jap. "He seen there was a sentiment in this town ag'in him, and he moved on. Clumb on to the kyar of scientific progress, mebby. How glad I am that we did not oscarcize him! Gentle measures are always best."

But that afternoon a settler come into town and said the old boy was still out on the prehayrie, drawing plans for some sort of contraption on the ground with a splinter off the rail.

"This won't never do," says Jap. "The open prehayrie with no protection ag'in the elerments except a rail is no place for a party of his age. We must not be crool. Let us go out and see what his plans for the future are." So after supper we took some grub in a noospaper and went out.

"Colonel," says Jap, "do you consider yourself permernently settled here on this knoll?" The old man sot up and says he:

"I am a martyr to scientific progress. I am ahead of my age. It is the old story. Do you know wot they done to Goliar when he invented the telescope and showed that the world buzzes round on its poles? Rid him on a rail out on to the prehayrie even as you done me."

"I recollect now reading 'bout it at the time in the noospapers," says Jap.

"And Goliar sot there even as I have sot here," says the old man. "History repeats herself. But the wheels of the kyar——"

"Yes, yes," says Jap, "we know about them wheels." Then we talked it over and concluded to leave him another night. We kept going out every evening, but he still hung on. On the third evening we found him more cheerful. He hopped up chipper as a spring lamb and says he: "Eurekar! Eurekar! I have solved it at last. I have found the missing link in my great invention. The Pulverhook Self-Sustaining Motor can now be perfected. The wheels of the kyar——"

"They move steadily on'ard," says Jap. "Let 'em move! Tell us about this yer motor." Then the old man talked without taking breath for twenty minutes, and we knowed less when he got through than when he begun. "But how am I to live?" he said in winding up. "I will tell you, gentlemen. I will issue stock in a motor company and for every dollar I receive in supplies or money I will give ten dollars in stock. It will take me six months to finish my model. In another six months my motor will be on the market and steam engines will rust in their tracks. Let me come back to your midst for six months while I finish my model. The wheels of the kyar——"

"Colonel," says Jap, "we'll hitch one of your motors to that kyar and make the yielding sand fly like a tornador. Boys, let's give him another chance." We talked it over and agreed to do so. "Come on," says we.

Then the old man clapped his hand on his back and says he: "Sleeping here on the prehayrie has give me a sort of a crick in my spiral colyum—reckon I'll have to go back as I come out." So we lifted him on to the rail and started back.

"Gents," says Jap, "I s'pose in a year from now you'll see even rails operated by his motor."

Well, the next day the old gent begun to tear around like a house afire. Got his stock printed at the Expositor office and paid for it in stock. Got a soap-box of groceries and paid for it in stock, and a ton of coal and paid in stock, and a lot of tools and lumber and iron and paid in stock, and a new soot of clothes and paid in stock, and borrowed fifty dollars and paid in stock, and then went back to the printing-office and ordered more stock printed and told the boy to keep out what he jedged was right for the job.

OUTING PUBLISHING COMPANY

Then he went to work, hammer and tongs, to make his motor. You could hear him hammering and bang-whacking and slam-banging away all day and half the night. He'd come tearing out every morning at half-past nine, like a setting hen coming off the nest, and go clucking round town on the dead run for 'bout a nour, selling stock, and then he'd go back and begin to lamjam things ag'in. This kept up all winter.

When we asked him to let us see his contraption, "No, no," he would say, "the time is not ripe. My motor is not yet perfected. Soon it will be and then you'ns shall see it. It is sure to succeed. Momentum and equilibr'um are at last going to work together. The Pulverhook Self-Sustaining Motor is about to reverlutionize the world. If you could take one or two more shares of stock it would put me through the week."

Well, it went on and on, him all the time selling us more stock and tearing round like a lunertic, till finally he said his model was done, and he invited everybody over to see it one afternoon. The room was 'bout full of stuff, and in the middle stood the critter, with wheels, and spiral tracks, and levers, and pipes, and dufunnies, and gilderflukes and everything you ever heard tell of.

"Gentlemen," says he, "you are now about to witness one of the greatest events which ever took place on this mungdane sp'ere. Would that some great painter like Michael Angell-oh was here to transfer the scene to canvas. Nothing can compare with it 'less when Columbus sailed out of the harbor of Peelhoss with his little fleet of the Niner, the Pinter and the Santa Claus. Columbus had his Iserheller—I have my faithful cit'zens of Sentinel Butte. Immejitly after the exhibition an opportunity will be give to all them who may wish to subscribe for a little more stock. Gentlemen, the wheels of the kyar——"

"Turn on the attraction of gravertation, old man, and let's see your contraption sagashiate," says Jap. Then the Colonel he pulled a lever, and says he:

"Behold, she moves! A new erar dawns! Out of darkness into light! The wheels of the kyar of——"

"Three cheers for the new erar!" yells Jap, and we give 'em, and all the time the thing was a-clanking and a-rumbling, and a lot of iron balls was a-going up around the spiral track and dropping into a kind of water-wheel, and going down and coming up again, and the old man was dancing first on one foot and then on the other, with a tear running off the end of his nose. Then at last he pushed back the lever and the thing stopped.

"That is one of its greatest beauties," says he; "it can be stopped. It would run on through the ages as long as the attraction of gravertation done its perfect work if we left it alone, but we can stop it if we wish, as you have seen. I propose to ship my model to Washington by express, and take the same train and there see about my patent. It is heavy to go by express, but time is money for all of us. This great invention must be got on to the market."

"Colonel Pulverhook," says Jap, "I think I voice the sentiments of this yer community when I say that we'd rather you'd ship on your model and then stay here yourself. We feel that we cannot part with you so sudden. Old man, you have twined yourself about our hearts, if I may so put it, and we cannot give you up. I think I speak for this yer little band of your loving friends," says Jap; which was the trooth, we having talked it over beforehand and decided that the old gent had got altogether too much of our money for us to afford to let him get out of our sight.

The Colonel bowed his head for a long time; then he raised it up and there was another tear on his nose, and says he: "Dear friends, I am touched. Not for many long years have I been so deeply moved. I am stirred to the innermost depths of my being. I will stay with you! It is not fitting that I should go. I will send on that model, though to part with it will tear my heart-strings, but I will stay in your midst. Here, and here alone, are my troo friends, them I love and respect, and them that love and I hope respect me. Excuse the tears of a weak old man, but this exhibition of your love is too much.

"A little more stock for the express," says the old man, and we each put up every last red cent we had. Then we went away, agreeing to call with a dray for the model early the next morning so's to get it off on the nine o'clock train. Till long past midnight we heard the old man hammering and pounding as he boxed the model. About eight o'clock the next morning we went around with the dray. The model stood by the door in a big box, all nailed up, and fastened with iron straps, and directed to the Patent Office, Washington, D. C.

"But where's the old man?" says somebody. Jap went over and peeked into the other room. "He's on the bed asleep," says he. "Worn out by the long strain he has throwed himself down and now slumbers peacefully as a baby. Poor old man, I reckon we oughter of treated him kinder. He's older than me, and I wasn't allus respectful. Boys," he goes on, turning to a passel of youngsters, "profit by my example. Yesterday I spoke harshly to Colonel Pulverhook and now I would that them words had never been spoke!"

"Wot about the box?" says Abner Blackmark. "We'll have to wake the Colonel for the express money if we are going to ship it."

"Never," says Jap. "Let us chip in and pay it. He'll give us more stock this afternoon." So we done so, and as we stood on the platform and watched the train speed away there were more wet eyes amongst us. "Gents," says Jap, "on this day we make history. Our names are not amongst them that are writ in water, as the feller said;" then he reg'larly breaks down and boohoos.

Well, we went back over town and set around feeling solemn and not saying much. It got along to four o'clock in the afternoon and still nothing was seen of the old man. "Perhaps he is sick," says somebody; "we oughter go up and see." So we went. Jap peeked into the bedroom and says he in a whisper: "He sleeps yet. Ought we to wake him?"

We decided we oughter, and Jap went in, tiptoeing along, carrying his hat in his hand. He touched the old man on the shoulder, then he sort o' started, then he grabbed him by the arm and yanked him off the bed and slung him up ag'in the ceiling, and when he come down jumped on him with both feet and begun to yell. "Beat, by thunder!" howls Jap, and we seen the hay busting out of the old man's clothes on the floor.

"Beat by a Tom-scatted fraud from North Carolina! Beat, great blazes!" and with every jump Jap's head struck the ceiling. "Beat by a Jim-snatched scoundrel from Buncombe County!" and the house shook as he jumped up and down and roared: "Beat! Beat! The heathen, the robber, the wolf in sheep's clothing! He was in that box we wet with our tears. Beat! Beat!" And he kept on jumping till he fell down, and crawled out into the other room unable to rise or yell but with his jaws still moving silently.

Then the rest of us made such remarks as seemed fitting to the occasion, after which we went through the booroo drawers and things without finding a cent. By this time Jap could stagger, and we started out. We heard a whine at the cellar door and opened it. Bill Purdy's big dorg which had been missing for a week come out. We went down in the cellar and found a tread-mill on which the dorg had stood and run the motor through a hole in the floor. In one corner laid the motor in a heap.

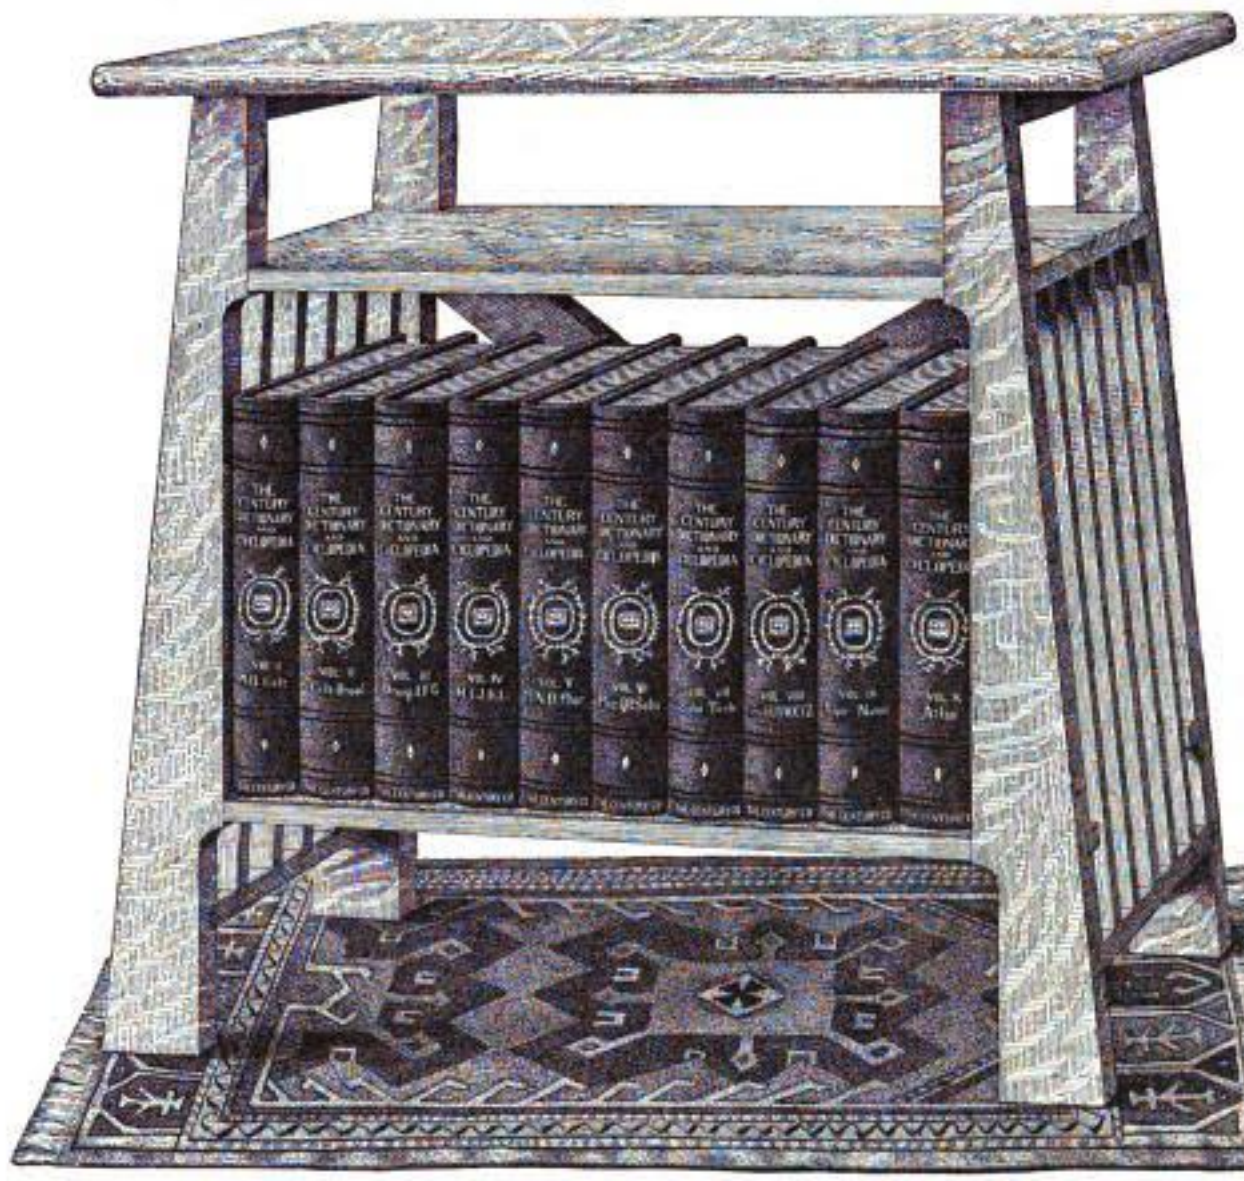
"Gentlemen," says Jap feebly, "the poet has said that some feelings lay too deep for words. This is them!" There was no sound as we filed out of the house save our solemn footfalls and the dorg wagging his tail.

Three days after we was in the post-office waiting sadly for the mail to be distributed. When it was about half done the postmaster put his head out of the winder and says he:

"Jap, here's a postal-card for you."

Jap takes it in a sort of weak way. "Read it, Jap," says we. He held it in the light and begun:

"Mr. Jap Bingerford: My Dear, Troo Friend: The wheels of the kyar of scientific progress move steadily on'ard though deeply embedded in the yielding sands of conservertism. Ever thine,



"GABRIEL PULVERHOOK,
"Late Colonel North Carolina Tigers."

One Dollar pays for a Membership in The Wanamaker "Century" Club. A Membership saves you exactly Half the purchase price on a set of "The Century." It sends you the books, complete, in their specially-designed Bookcase, without further immediate payment. It privileges you to pay the Half-Price a little at a time—practically on your own terms. It thus ensures your ownership of the work that is acknowledged to be of MORE PRACTICAL USE than any other ever published—and at the lowest price at which it has EVER been offered.

That's what one dollar will do—if spent wisely and promptly!

The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia and Atlas is an encyclopedia built like a dictionary—with each of its items in its own alphabetical place instead of hidden in long chapters under some general heading, which was the old-fashioned way. It is the only reference work that is really used daily by half a million people in this country alone (and many of them were glad to pay the twice-bigger price which was charged before The Wanamaker Century Club was organized).

The Century is its own reason for its widespread popularity. It encourages its occasional use into a daily habit—The Century Habit—which simply means "knowing things without effort."

Ask any Century owner. He will tell you that The Century volumes are the best of all books to work with, to read with, to think with. If you have thought The Century beyond your means, it is no longer so. The Wanamaker Century Club, by its immense selling power, has brought it within the reach of every one. The latest revised edition is controlled by us absolutely. It is unabridged and is the only authorized edition now published by The Century Co.

If you will mail us the coupon in the corner, with your name and address written plainly, we will send you a book that will explain to you why The Century is different from any other work of reference; why nearly every one who has found out what it really contains now owns a set,—and why we think you, in particular, would be interested. Sending the coupon does not bind you to purchase. It simply gives us the opportunity, which we want very much, of putting you in full possession of the details of what we feel to be the greatest book opportunity ever offered.

Soul Sonnets of A Stenographer

BY S. E. KISER

XI

How handsome Teddy Roberts is! Last night,
When William had gone home and Ted and I
Were here alone, I heard him gently sigh,
As, standing with me in the fading light,
He took my hand, not asking if he might,
And, pointing out the window at the sky
All colored as with some soft, crimson dye,
Asked if I ever saw a lovelier sight.

How sweet the moment was! It seemed to me
As if we gently floated off in space,
Or out upon some smooth, enchanted sea:
The town was lost below us, and his face
Was very close to mine — regretfully
I drew away, evading his embrace.

XII

I wonder if it's best for me to wait
Till Death and she decide to turn him loose?
But fudge! I'll not seek trouble; what's the use?
Success waits not upon, but governs Fate:
I'll keep dear Teddy nibbling at the bait —
When William isn't watching, dear old goose —
And, if he presses, find some fair excuse
To make him hope that Time will set things straight.

Then, if the doctors pull her through at last,
And all my happy dreams are spoiled, and all
The splendid castles that I've built must fall,
I need not sit defeated nor downcast,
But, giving Love his victory, install
Ted in my heart, forgetting all the past.

XIII

Last Sunday afternoon I walked along
The splendid avenue where they reside:
I saw the house and thought of her inside,
And, half-oblivious of the passing throng,
Without once wishing anybody wrong,
I seemed to see myself there as his bride,
And, throwing all the doors of fancy wide,
I lightly hummed a happy little song.

How beautiful it was! How proud I'll be
When all the busy servants there are mine:
I'll have my breakfast brought to me at Nine
And make the butler dress in livery,
And, best of all, I'll have a chance to shine
O'er snobbish ones who now look down on me.

XIV

I met Nell Brackett last night in the street:
I'd hate to wear the new hat that she's got.
Poor thing, she thinks that she has Teddy caught,
And fancies that I'll occupy a seat
Away back near the door. Ah me! how sweet
'Twill be when I am Mrs. Worthalot
To nod at her sometimes and show I'm not Too proud to see the old friends that I meet.

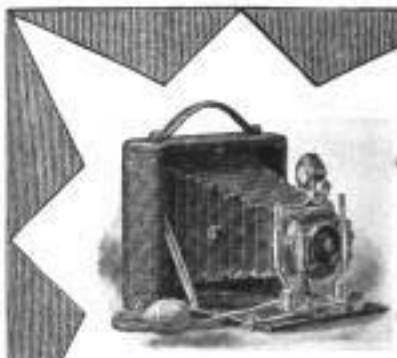
How sorry I should be to have to pad
The way she does to fill her clothes; they say
Her figure's something frightful. It's too bad
That girls should try to fool the men that way:
When I am William's I will make him glad
By wearing something low-necked every day.

XV

Poor Nell! She's said mean things concerning me:
But I forgive her. Goodness, what's the use
Of being angry at the little goose?
She's half beside herself with jealousy!
If everything turns out all right I'll be
Her dearest friend: I'll hoist a flag of truce
And help her get dear Teddy in the noose,
And show her that she's judged me wrongfully.

And when they're married I can fix it so
That Ted will be discharged, and then, when Nell
Comes humbly pleading for him, I will tell
Her how I pity her, poor thing, although
I'm very, very high and she is low,
And tell her to trust me — 'twill all be well.



XVI

I thought I'd see a fortune-teller who
Has told some wondrous things for friends of mine:
She told me that my horoscope was fine:
"You'll marry wealth," she said, "but only through
A charm I'll give can he be brought to you:
When he this lozenge eats for you he'll pine."
And over it she made a mystic sign —
The old hag charged three dollars for it, too.

The next day William said his throat was sore;
And when I'd given him the charm he bit
A little chunk and sat there chewing it,
Then suddenly jumped up and raved and tore
And knocked the dictionary on the floor —
I thought the dear old man would have a fit.

SYSTEM in BUSINESS

System in business means success. That needs no argument.
If your systems are wrong, you want to know it, and NOW.

READ THIS PAGE

We tell you here of methods that are new — practical methods proven so by actual test.

These systems have helped other bright business and professional men. They will just so surely help you.

To get the most work from yourself or from your employees you must have the proper tools for every purpose.

There are desks that save time, and chairs that save backache. They are all a part of system.

Old fashioned bound books for accounts are impractical and expensive. Loose leaf books allow of arrangement, rearrangement and expansion. They save time, for the yearly or semi-yearly opening of new books is done away with. They are self indexing. No outside index is required. The JONES LOOSE LEAF BOOKS have every advantage of any loose leaf book and more — absolute alignment of the leaves — a strong binder in which the leaves cannot move a hair's breadth. Every progressive business man should read Catalog I. It explains JONES LOOSE LEAF LEDGERS and how you can use them in your business. And there isn't a mercantile house in the country where they cannot be used to advantage.

Some business men are prejudiced against fountain pens. And that same prejudice has kept them from knowing how great a saving WATERMAN'S IDEAL FOUNTAIN PENS would make in their office work. Continuous writing without dipping and blotting saves so much of a man's own time — and the time of his stenographers and clerks — that a pen pays for itself in a short time. But the fountain pen must be a "Waterman," else the bother and leaks and breaks might offset the saving. Catalog 5 tells all about Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pens, and of special pens made for modern office work. Write for catalog. If you are specially interested in manifold work, tell us.

The PROTECTOGRAPH will absolutely secure the integrity of your checks. It impresses a line like this:

in strictly indelible ink upon any preferred part of the check so deeply as to make the line a part of the document itself and absolutely unalterable and ineffaceable. It is used by the U. S. Treasury and more than 10,000 financial and industrial institutions. The machine is a model of mechanical beauty, simplicity and efficiency. Write for Catalog 15 which tells some things about check raising and check protection that you may not know. A postal card will bring it.

The little things in an office sometimes save the most time, labor and money. RUBBER STAMPS, NUMBERING MACHINES, ETC., suited to your business, will aid you in a countless number of ways, and at little cost considering the valuable service they can render. There is system in using stamps, too, that you ought to know about. An ingenious little holder called "Rex" keeps them in order, clean and handy. The best ideas on Rubber Stamps and kindred articles are described in Catalog 12. New ideas for Rubber Stamps are being discovered almost daily. If you send for this catalog you will receive not only the latest and most practical ideas discovered up to date, but will be kept informed of new schemes that are being constantly originated in the leading mercantile houses.

Every man who conducts correspondence is interested in the question "Which is the best typewriter?" There are twenty-five substantial reasons why the OLIVER TYPEWRITER is the best machine the world has produced. So phenomenally successful has this machine become that it has proven its unqualified right to the title, "The Standard Visible Writer," and the business world has decided that its adoption increases quantity, improves quality and reduces expense. Strong claims — but easily proven. The wide range of the Oliver Typewriter's usefulness makes it easy to adopt systems heretofore impracticable except with the pen. Catalog 2 explains in detail.

The ADDRESSOGRAPH is as necessary to a modern office as steam is to an engine. With it an office boy can do in one hour what it formerly took ten clerks two hours to do. It not only addresses envelopes in exact imitation of typewriting, but also fills in names on duplicate letters, prints names and addresses on shipping tags, pay envelopes, time tickets, monthly statements and loose leaf systems. Thousands of business houses now have their lists of names arranged for the Addressograph and kept by States or Territories so that printed matter can be speedily sent to any special list. There is at least one place in your business for the Addressograph. Learn now what it will do. Catalog 7 describes it, and illustrates its many uses. Write for it to-day.

Modern business methods presuppose a convenient and orderly arrangement of papers. By the most approved system all orders, forms and records are spread on punched loose sheets, which are filed and classified according to the varying needs of each business. While in active use these loose sheets are kept in Holders if there be few, and in Binders if there be many; and when old the sheets are consecutively filed away in Transfer Binders as permanent records. The TATUM HOLDERS and BINDERS comprise 3 styles and 78 stock sizes. With them any one can easily start and maintain a loose-sheet system. These and other office devices are described in our printed matter. Ask for Catalog No. 16.

No office is considered complete without an EDISON MIMEOGRAPH. In these days of commercial competition there is no surer, quicker or cheaper way of quickening business than by employing the many means offered by this valuable machine. There is a place in almost any business where an Edison Mimeograph will save time and money. Perhaps you see no use for it in your office. You probably will after you read Catalog 6 and understand what a Mimeograph will do. It will pay you well to read it. Simply cut out and sign the coupon on the corner of this advertisement, or better still write us a letter stating your business, and we can suggest methods to meet your requirements.

Time is money. This is particularly true in the commercial world. BAIRD'S No. 12 TIME STAMP makes an absolutely accurate record for every purpose where time counts. The receipt of correspondence, job time, the arrival and departure of employees and in countless other cases time is measured to the minute by this — the only durable time stamp. It is made of the finest materials, with finely polished steel bearings. The clock movement, being in an entirely separate compartment from the stamping mechanism, is unaffected by the hammer action. The price is remarkably low. Catalog 3 describes and illustrates the Baird Time Stamp.

For many years methods of accounting did not change materially, but when the BURROUGHS ADDING MACHINE was placed on the market this branch of office work was revolutionized. To-day there are 12,500 of these great time savers in banks, mercantile houses, factories, wholesale and retail stores, etc. Wherever this machine is not part of an office equipment it is because its merits are not understood. The Burroughs Adding Machine bears the same relation to figures that the typewriter does to correspondence. It adds figures with ten times the speed of the quickest clerk and it is mechanically impossible for it to make a mistake. Described in Catalog 13. Write for it.

A postal scale is not a luxury — it is a necessity. The greater the amount of mail, the more actual necessity it becomes. The owner of a PELOUZE "MAIL & EXPRESS" SCALE will save its cost in a short time, and the heavier and larger his mail is the shorter the time will be. It tells the exact cost of postage on all mail matter. It weighs express packages up to 16 lbs. — every scale is warranted. Whether your mail list is large or small, it will help you to cut down your stamp bill. Catalog 10 will give you useful information about Reliable Postal Scales. Ask for it on the coupon.

No matter what you want to file — information, papers, samples, documents — there is a Shaw-Walker way to do it. And that way is the best way because it is the most simple. Shaw-Walker card systems are better than books — Shaw-Walker vertical letter files better than flat sheet cabinets — Shaw-Walker sectional bookcases better than solid ones. All are built in sections so they will grow as your business grows. Send to-day for Catalog 19. It tells all about SHAW-WALKER SYSTEMS. The book is concise, terse, yet complete. Costs the Shaw-Walker Company 38c. to send it, but they will do so gladly if you simply sign the coupon on the corner of this advertisement.

AN ERICSSON INTERIOR TELEPHONE SYSTEM shortens office work, saves actual time, saves confusion. To some men such a system seems a luxury. All who have installed the system know it is an economy. Cheap interior 'phones soon get out of order. That's worse than no system at all. But the Ericsson is built to last — the same quality and style used on long distance lines. No other concern anywhere has studied the telephone system so thoroughly, or devised so many special instruments and attachments to save time and bother in office communication. The Ericsson system contains all the best features of other 'phones and some features found in no other 'phones. Ask now for Catalog 4.

There was a time when any old chair would do for the office. Business and comfort were not partners. But times have changed and ideas of business comfort have changed with them. MCCLOUD'S NEW TWENTIETH CENTURY ADJUSTED SPRING BACK CHAIRS have been important factors in the improvement. "Back Resters" they call them — because they give complete back rest while at work, thereby enabling the man at the desk or woman at the typewriter to accomplish more work with greater comfort. Catalog 14 describes the McCloud Chairs and shows the adjustment which fits the back.

A business man of to-day must be in instant touch with every branch of his establishment. The desk telephone enables him to do this, but to be of greatest service it should be right at his elbow in a GRIGGS IMPROVED TELEPHONE HOLDER. The Griggs Holder can be attached to the end of any desk or other support, and leaves the desk slide free for other use. It places the 'phone within reach when wanted and out of the way when not in use. Without a Griggs Holder a desk 'phone can be a nuisance — with it a help and economizer of time. It is adjustable and fits any size base of telephone. Described in Catalog 18.

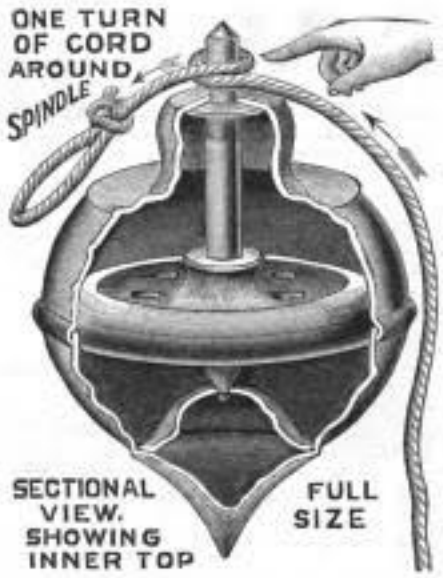
Mistaking the Person

By Dr. William Mathews



THERE is a capital story of a clergyman in England who was driving in a dog-cart near a railway station in the country, and overtook a gentleman who was walking toward a village that was at a long distance therefrom. Learning that the stranger was going to the village, he offered to drive him there. "Have you seen the papers to-day?" asked the parson when the stranger had accepted and taken a seat. "Yes; what is in them?" "Why, that rascal, John Bright, has been making another speech." "What was it about?" asked the stranger. The clergyman explained. "Well," said the stranger, "perhaps Mr. Bright was only expressing his honest convictions; perhaps, even, he may be right." "Oh, no," said the irate parson; "if I had him here I should just feel like shooting him." Before the men separated the stranger had promised to go to his new acquaintance's church on the morrow. The subject of the discourse was Mr. Bright's speech, and at the conclusion the gentleman whom he had invited to church thanked him for his able sermon. As the delighted rector was going home to dinner, a friend met him and said: "You have been preaching under distinguished patronage this morning." "No," said the parson. "Oh, yes, you have," replied the friend; "you had John Bright for a hearer."

How many of our readers have ever heard of Joseph Dennie, a native of Boston, one of the most polished writers of America a century ago? He was editor successively of the Tablet, the Farmers' Weekly Museum, a very popular paper at Walpole, New Hampshire, and the Portfolio, a literary periodical published in Philadelphia. To these he contributed a series of elegant and delightful papers under the pen-name of Oliver Old School, which won for him the title of "the Addison of America." He wrote with great rapidity, and put off the preparation of his "copy" till the last moment. It is said that one of the best of his lay-sermons was written in the tavern at Walpole when he and his friends were engaged in a game at cards. It was delivered to the printer's devil by piecemeal at four or five different times; and, if he chanced to be engaged in a game, he would ask some one to play his hand for him while he "gave the devil his due." One of the most remarkable incidents of his too brief career — for he was born in 1768 and died in 1812 — was his introduction to the great American theologian and educator, Timothy Dwight, President of Yale College.

It chanced that Doctor Dwight, at a time when his fame was at its height, was traveling in New Jersey and stopped for the night at a hotel in one of its large towns. At a late hour of the same night arrived also Mr. Dennie, who had the ill luck to learn from the landlord that all his beds were filled with two lodgers each, except one, which was occupied by the giant of theology, the celebrated Doctor Dwight. "Please show me to his apartment," said Dennie; "although I am a stranger to the Reverend Doctor, perhaps I can bargain with him for a lodging." With some hesitation and objection the landlord escorted Dennie to the Doctor's room, and there left him to introduce himself. The Doctor, who had just got ready his night-gown, cap and slippers, preparatory to divesting himself of his clothing for the night, courteously shook hands with the visitor and begged him to be seated. Struck with the intellectual physiognomy of his companion, he relaxed his usual severity of aspect, and, after the interchange of some words about the occasion of their interview, the two began a lively literary chat.

The characters of Washington, Franklin, Rittenhouse, Brockden Brown, and scores of other eminent Americans were freely and brilliantly discussed, and each of the newly-made acquaintances was delighted with the other, when Doctor Dwight began to speak of Dennie. "Dennie, the editor of the Portfolio," said he earnestly, "is the Addison of this country, the father of American belles-lettres. In the purity and elegance of his style he has no superior. But is it not

Editor's Note — This is the second paper by Doctor Mathews on famous blunders published under the title "Mistaking the Person."

Irving's Wizard Top
SCIENTIFIC WONDER

That delights and elicits the admiration of every living, thinking person, regardless of age or sex. Its performance exceeds in variety $100.00 worth of mechanical toys. It makes more revolutions per minute than any piece of mechanism ever before constructed. Scientists pronounce it the most wonderful and instructive scientific toy in existence. We honestly assert that all who purchase this top for the boy or girl enjoy its mysterious performance even more than do the children.

For verification see following letter:

METZGER COLLEGE, Department of Chemistry and Physics.

THE WIZARD NOVELTY CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIRS: I have received from you an Irving's "Wizard Top," and consider it by far the most wonderful and instructive scientific toy now on the market. Its performance is almost limitless in variety and it cannot fail to interest all ages and classes. It is constructed on accurate scientific principles, making it not only a toy but a valuable aid in demonstrating natural laws. I hope to see it have an extensive sale. Very truly yours,

Signed: WM. H. AMES, Professor of Chemistry and Physics.

BRIEFLY IRVING'S WIZARD TOP is a top within a top; made of Steel, nickel plated; a veritable ROTARY ENGINE; can be handled with impunity while running at highest speed. It maintains its equilibrium at any angle. Its average spin is 8 minutes; the quickest and most effective known method of producing intense rotary motion. A child can spin it in 3 seconds. It performs over 40 tricks. Its equal cannot be had. It is worth one dollar, but by taking advantage of this Special Advertising Offer you can procure one for next to NOTHING. You advance us 25c. by mail to cover costs. We send you the top complete, prepaid, and a strictly bonable proposition by which your advancement is recovered.

NOTICE.—This offer comprises our improved nickel-plated top.

astonishing that a man of such genius should abandon himself to the inebriating bowl and to bacchanalian revels?" "Sir," said Dennie, "you are grossly mistaken. I have been intimately acquainted with that gentleman for years, and I never once have known him to be intoxicated." "Sir," protested the Doctor, "you err. I have my information from an intimate friend of that writer, and I am confident that you are wrong."

Dennie now ingeniously turned the conversation into another channel, and said: "I consider Dr. Timothy Dwight, the President of Yale College, as beyond all question the most learned theologian, the first logician, and the finest poet that America has yet produced. But, sir, I am sorry to add that there are traits in his character not only amazing in so great and wise a man, but absolutely repulsive. He is the greatest bigot and dogmatist of the age!"

"Sir," cried the man thus praised and defamed, "allow me to say that you are grossly mistaken. I have been long and intimately acquainted with Doctor Dwight, and I know most positively that your statement is untrue." "Sir," rejoined Dennie, "I beg your pardon, but it is you who are misinformed. I have the facts from one who knows the Doctor thoroughly, who is unprejudiced, and who, I am confident, could not be deceived." "No more slander!" cried the Doctor, springing from his chair and gesticulating with great earnestness. "I am Doctor Dwight, of whom you speak!" "And I," cried the other with equal earnestness, "am Mr. Dennie, of whom you spoke!" The astonishment of the great divine may be more easily conceived than described. The result of the stormy interview was that they shook hands and laughed heartily, and became for the rest of their days fast friends.

An amusing anecdote, worthy to rank with the foregoing, is told of William H. Seward when he was Governor of New York. It relates to the days when he, Weed and Hastings were a triumvirate that ruled the State—Weed being the head. Seward was one day journeying by stage to the northern part of the State—the backwoods—and sitting outside next the driver, who, not knowing who he was, chatted familiarly and frankly. Enjoying his incognito, the Governor thought it might be a good time to pick up some local political information that might one day be serviceable. Partly for this purpose, and partly to make the driver think he was a citizen of another State, he asked: "Who is Governor of New York now?" Quick as flash came the reply: "It is Thurlow Weed."

The danger of making a parade of scholarship when one has but a small stock of classic lore is well illustrated in a story of a young Oxonian, fresh from the University, who was one day making a display of his acquisitions in a stage-coach. Among the marks of learning with which he sought to garnish his conversation were some lines of Greek verse which, he said, were from Sophocles. Among the travelers in the coach was the famous classical scholar, Doctor Porson, who, roused from his slumbers in a corner of the coach by the Greek quotation, said to the student, as he rubbed his eyes: "You observed that the lines you quoted were from Sophocles. I do not happen to recollect them as his." "Oh, sir," replied the youth, "the quotation is word for word as I have given it." Upon this the Doctor, drawing out from a pocket of his greatcoat a small copy of Sophocles, quietly handed it to the young man, and asked him if he would be so kind as to point out the passage in question in that little book. After turning over the leaves of the volume for some time the Oxonian said: "Upon second thought, I now remember that the passage is in Euripides." "Then, perhaps, sir," said the Doctor, thrusting his hand into his pocket, and handing to the youth therefrom a similar edition of Euripides, "you will be so good as to find it for me in that little book." Again the Oxonian searched for the passage, but with no better success, muttering: "Curse me, if ever I quote Greek again!"

The tittering of the ladies increased his discomfort, but at last, "Bless me, sir," he exclaimed; "how dull I am to-day! I recollect now—yes—yes, I perfectly remember that the passage is in Æschylus." Once more the inexorable Doctor returned to his inexhaustible pocket, and was in the act of handing him a copy of Æschylus, when the astonished collegian vociferated: "Stop the coach! Halloa, coachman, let me out, I say, instantly! There's a fellow here that has got the whole Bodleian library in his pocket. Let me out, I say, let me out! He must be Porson or the devil!"

A Woman's Washington

By The Congressman's Wife

SOMEHOW the coming together of the new Senate has been wonderfully suggestive of the coming together, in the old Biblical tale, of all the animate things of the earth, when they marched before Noah to be ticketed for the Ark. Not that the florally bedecked Senate Chamber and the clamorous galleries, which for once in a way Mr. Frye did not threaten to clear, bore much resemblance to the flood-time of Noah, but the assembling of Senators, arm in arm and two by two as they marched solemnly down the middle aisle and stood before Mr. Frye for their swearing in, did bring to mind very forcibly the old words of the Bible, "They, and every beast after his kind, went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh."

And these legislators, after the manner of Noah's animate creatures when they buzzed about for their places in the Ark, also buzzed around in the Senate Chamber for their seats.

I said to the new Member, whose own legislative hall had adjourned the day before sine die, and who was sitting beside me, an interested spectator:

"This grand scramble for seats reminds me of the old game of 'stage-coach,' where everybody at a word gets up to change seats." I leaned over the railing to scan the chamber. "How jovial everybody looks. Observe the monster slap that Senator Hanna has just bestowed upon Senator Foraker's back. And see, Senator Nelson has taken a fellow-Senator by the ear and tweaked him up from the sofa at the back of the chamber, and note the elaborate would-be polite exchange between Senator Gorman and Senator McComas, the twin Senators from Maryland. And Senator Tillman has not only just pulled down his own vest, but he's smoothing down Senator Spooner's as well. I am thankful that Mr. Slocum is to get away from Cherokee Strip at last. He and Senator Foraker are both to go over on the Republican side this session."

"I notice," said the new Member, "that each desk is supplied with the Red Book and each man will know the biography of every other man. And the two new Delaware men, Ball and Allee, will have to take their turn at Cherokee Strip. Smoot gets a seat way back on the Republican side, and Gorman gets his old seat. By the way, it is fifty years since Gorman entered the Senate."

"Fifty years!" I echoed incredulously.

"Yes; he entered the Senate exactly fifty years ago — as a page."

I swept my eyes over the row of boy pages clustered around on the steps at the foot of the President's desk, then across at Senator Gorman, half-hidden behind a mass of flowers. I was trying to realize that he had ever been one of these mischievous, shrewd, blasé youngsters, who can size up a statesman or play a prank with equal dexterity.

"Well," said I, "it is a far cry from a page on the steps to a Senator in his seat, but I have always heard that a determined man and a waterfall can be relied on to channel their own path. I wonder," said I, my mind on the Senate pages, "whether these youngsters have been made happy this spring by their usual can of maple syrup? You know, perhaps, that Senator Proctor has a famous maple grove up in Vermont, and every spring he gives each page a can of his best syrup, and such a sugaring-off as there is among them! I met a whole procession of these boys once filing out of the Capitol each with a can of maple syrup hugged to his breast."

Just here I saw that Robert and Senator P—— from the floor below were beckoning us to come down. We soon joined them. Robert said:

"We're going to take a recess. After recess the Senate is likely to break out into an epidemic of fight, so let us fortify with some luncheon."

"What's up?" asked the new Member.

"Oh," said Senator P—— dryly, "our Senatorial feelings are hurt. Your esteemed 'Uncle Joe' Cannon, before you adjourned yesterday in the House, hurled the word 'blackmail' at the Senate, and Hale has his dander up and is going to reply. We fear we are in for a regular gabfest."

"Goodness!" said I, "how in the world, then, if Mr. Cannon and Senator Hale are at

PRIZES TO COOKS

$7,500.00 In Cash to be Distributed

Between now and July 1st, family cooks, whether employees or the mistress of the household, will be following the plan laid down for improvement in cooks in a contest for 735 cash prizes ranging from $200.00 to $5.00 offered by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd.

The winners must show improvement in general cookery as clearly stated in the rules for the test.

No one has to buy or pay anything whatever. It is simply an earnest effort on the part of Mr. Post to stimulate the household cook to more careful and skillful cookery.

To have light, sweet bread and cakes instead of heavy, sour and indigestible things. To have no more greasy, burned or dried-out meats. To have properly made Coffee, Postum and tea. To have delicate and digestible, toothsome desserts and a table clean, tasty and a pleasure to look upon.

And so $7,500.00 in actual money will be spent to encourage the cooks of the country to better effort. And you housekeepers, please forever abandon the term "hired girl." Teach your cook the dignity of her profession, call her the cook.

If her duties include other service, well and good, but don't detract from her professional title by calling her the "hired girl." That term don't fit a good cook. A certificate bearing the large seal of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., will go to each of the 735 winners in this contest. These certificates or diplomas will be as valuable to the holders as a doctor's sheepskin is to him.

A postal card to the Cookery Dept. No. 419, of the big pure food factories of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., at Battle Creek, Mich., will bring a sheet of plainly printed rules for the contest.

daggers drawn, will they meet aboard the Dolphin in a day or two? For I hear they are both to be of the party that is going off with Secretary Moody on a cruise."

"Oh, they only fight in public," laughed all three men. "When they meet on the deck of the Dolphin Hale will extend the glad hand with his unfailing courtesy and with a twinkle, 'Uncle Joe' will take it with a corresponding twinkle, then 'Uncle Joe' will produce a stick of gum, which is his pipe of peace, and it will be all over."

"Do you mean to say," I asked of the new Member in surprise, "that Mr. Cannon, the future Speaker of the House, chews gum?"

"To be sure," said the new Member. "'Uncle Joe' can outdo any schoolgirl in the United States. He only likes a bit of gum while the sweet taste lasts, and can make a package of gum disappear in no time. We have joked him all winter about it over in the House."

"It is about like the taste in books that prevails in our body," said Senator P——. "Some of my colleagues have been reading incessantly lately, particularly while Morgan was holding forth in executive session. One of my friends sent over to the Library for a book, and he was so absorbed by it that I tiptoed over to see what he was reading. It bore the highly instructive title, Shadowed by Three."

"Another book," broke in the new Member, "that would make mighty interesting reading in the manuscript would be the private social register of one of these much-discussed social secretaries of smart dames. This social secretary is new to me. Do explain why and wherefore she exists, Mrs. Slocum."

"Oh, well," said I, taking up the vexed question, "the social secretary is a fashion, a fad, with smart dames. She is a necessity in some cases—but in very few cases, I must say. There are secretaries and secretaries in Washington. There is the young woman who takes it up professionally and who is willing to efface herself socially. She works at it systematically, and does not permit her own prejudices or animosities or ambitions to appear in anything she does. Then there is the sweet young woman who only desires to 'help Pa,' and who incidentally thereby keeps some part of Pa's perquisites in the family which otherwise would go to an outsider. Then there is the really truly social secretary, who only goes into the smartest, highest establishments. She is usually the scion of some old family whose social greatness does not match its fortunes. This young woman knows everybody. She is ambitious and she is a real power. She dispenses dinner invitations, tea and snubs impartially, and——"

"Then she does exist? She does snub?" asked the new Member.

"Yes," said I, "she does exist. She does snub, and it is more important to be in her good graces than in her employer's. She has to work like a galley-slave, for she keeps three sets of books—the dinner book, the luncheon book and the book with the visiting list, which she weeds out zealously every few weeks. She pours tea at afternoon receptions and keeps her eye upon every visitor who enters the doors of her patroness. If there is any snubbing to be done she does it, not only for her patroness but often upon her own account. If she is serving an official family she divides her patroness' list of friends and acquaintances into lots, sort of job-lots. She separates the sheep from the goats, of course, and oddly enough there are some people in Washington who resent being put in the category of the latter——"

"Whew!" ejaculated the new Member with so much vim that Robert and Senator P—— both laughed. Then he asked:

"How many social secretaries does the town boast of? and are these young women well paid?"

"Oh," said I, thinking a minute, "I only know of two or three who are in any way autocratic, and their pay is——"

"Is about proportioned," interrupted Senator P—— cynically, "to what they are able to accomplish, I imagine. It's about like what Audley, the famous annuity monger, once said was the value of a certain office in his time. 'Some hundreds to any one who wishes to get to Heaven soon, twice as much to him who does not mind being in purgatory, and nobody knows what to him who is not afraid of the Old Harry.'"

"By the way," said Robert, mentioning some gossip that was about town, "I hear that Secretary Hay is going to become a Marylander—that he is to become Lord Proprietary of the old Lord Baltimore estate, just over the border of the District, in Maryland."

W. M. OSTRANDER, 1421 N. A. Bldg., Philadelphia

"Yes," said Senator P——, "it is true. Hay has just bought eight hundred acres and the old manor house, Mt. Airy, better known among real old Marylanders as 'His Lordship's Kindness.' This old manor is part of an original grant from Charles the First to Cecilius Calvert, second Lord Baltimore. The present house, low-roofed, two-storied and rambling, was built in 1666, and has never passed away from the Calverts until now. Cecilius Calvert and his father before him, George Calvert, were two of the most magnificent specimens of lofty, high-minded men that ever came to this or any other country to settle. It was nip and tuck, though, that the whole grant of Maryland was not called Crescentia, as that was the name the King had set his heart upon, and we should have been writing 'Baltimore, Crescentia,' instead of 'Baltimore, Maryland.' But Lord Baltimore diplomatically reminded the King that as Virginia had been named for the great Tudor Queen, it would be a compliment to his own fair Stuart spouse to call the new land for her. As Charles was rather partial to his Queen, Henrietta Maria, he took up with the notion, and the grant was made out for 'Terra Maria,' the Land of Mary. Lord Baltimore's own wife's name, Anne Arundel, was given to one of the counties afterward in the new State. Mt. Airy as it stands to-day is picturesque and entirely Colonial."

"I hope, then," said I, "that he will keep the place with its history and its traditions intact, and above all that he will keep the old name, 'His Lordship's Kindness.'"

"That is a very pretty bit of sentiment," commented Robert, "but history and traditions were never yet known to keep out the rain when the roof leaked. It would be like what I heard a Southern man style, 'Cultivating ruffles to the neglect of the shirt.'"

"Ah," chuckled the new Member, "have you heard the apt saying or story of a Southern man lately, in answer to General Basil Duke, apropos of the President's Southern policy? Well, it was at the alumni dinner of the University of Virginia and General Basil Duke, as you all know, stood by the President's negro policy in a taking, clever speech, and then Walton Moore, former State Senator of Virginia, got up and quite brought down the house. He said:

"'I can only say, gentlemen, in reply to General Duke's attitude and that of our President in this matter, that I once knew a clever old negro named Rastus who determined to buy his freedom. He found that he was valued at sixteen hundred dollars, but that his easy-going master was willing to take eight hundred dollars for him; so Rastus went to work. He had various small trades at his command and in due time had raised six hundred out of the eight hundred dollars, which he took to his master and deposited on account. Then he was so jubilant he thought he would celebrate the event with a coon hunt, and asked two negroes from a neighboring plantation to join in it. When the hunt was over and the coon was safely bestowed in a gunny-sack it was just daybreak and the three negroes sat down on the railroad track to rest, when without any warning of whistle a train came along and before you could say Jack Robinson all but Rastus were run over and killed. Rastus took to his heels and tore home. Early as it was, he awakened his master.

"'Master, Master! Is you done got dat six hund'ed dolla's I giv you?'

"'Why, Rastus, of course I've got it.'

"'I want it back, Master.'

"'But, Rastus, in a few months you'll be free. Why do you want the bargain off?'

"'I's jus' don' learnt, Master, dat darkeys is mighty pe'ilous prope'ty, an' I jus' wants de money back.'"

"I suppose he got it?" I inquired when the laugh had died down.

"Oh, of course," returned the new Member, "but that story did not stop there; it kept on till it got up to the White House."

"There are more good stories that travel to and from the White House than I have ever heard before in all my forty years in Washington," said Senator P——, "and not least among them was what the sheriff of Deadwood said to the President the other night at the musicale up there. Madame Schumann-Heink had just sung one of those big things that run up the scale, and the President, anxious to know how it impressed his old friend from the West, said enthusiastically:

"'Well, Sheriff, what do you think of that?'

"'Oh, Mr. President, I don't know what to think. I never got that high up the gulch!'"

"FOR THIRTY-FIVE YEARS A STANDARD PIANO"

The Wing Piano

FROM THE FACTORY AT WHOLESALE PRICES

45 Styles to select from

Save from $100 to $200 We make the Wing Piano and sell it ourselves. It goes direct from our factory to your home. We do not employ any agents or salesmen, and do not sell through dealers or retail stores. When you buy the Wing Piano you pay the actual cost of making it and our one small wholesale profit. This profit is small because we sell thousands of pianos yearly. Most retail stores sell no more than twelve to twenty pianos yearly, and must charge from $100 to $200 profit on each. Think for yourself; they cannot help it.

Sent on Trial We will send any Wing Piano to any part of the United States on trial. We pay freight in advance and do not ask for any advance payment or deposit. If the piano is not satisfactory after twenty days' trial in your home, we take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing unless you keep the piano. There is absolutely no risk or expense to you. Old instruments taken in exchange.

Instrumental Attachment imitates perfectly the tones of the mandolin, guitar, harp, zither and banjo. Music written for these instruments with and without piano accompaniment can be played just as perfectly by a single player on the piano as though rendered by an orchestra. The original instrumental attachment has been patented by us, and it cannot be had in any other piano. Beware of imitations.

In 35 Years over 36,000 Pianos We refer to over 36,000 satisfied purchasers in every part of the United States. Wing Pianos are guaranteed for twelve years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship or material.

Prominent Purchasers United States Governor Sayers of Texas, Governor Longino of Mississippi, Governor Bliss of Michigan, United States Senator Cameron, General W. R. Miles, Supreme Court Justice James, are among those who endorse the Wing Piano.

You Need This Book if you intend to buy a piano. A book—not a catalogue—that gives you all the information possessed by experts. It makes the selection of a piano easy. It is the only book of its kind ever published. It contains 116 pages, and is named "The Book of Complete Information About Pianos." We send it free to anyone wishing to buy a piano. Write for it.

Wing Organs are sold under the same guarantee as Wing Pianos. Sent on trial to any part of the United States, freight paid in advance by us, without any advance payment or deposit being made. Sold on easy monthly payments.

OPPORTUNITY

Being the Story Told for the First Time of How the New Secretary of Commerce and Labor, George Bruce Cortelyou, Refused a Fortune

By A. Maurice Low

MR. GEORGE B. CORTELYOU

WE SHALL be glad to pay you $100,000 for your work."

The man to whom this offer of a comfortable fortune had been made did not hesitate.

"Impossible that I should consider the offer at this time," he said.

This conversation took place the day after the burial of President McKinley. Mr. George Bruce Cortelyou, the former President's secretary, and not only his secretary but his intimate friend and trusted adviser, between whom and his late chief existed a bond as close as that between father and son, returned to Washington with a heart bowed down with sorrow. After the long strain and vigil of Buffalo, where hope wrestled with fear, there followed the even more agonizing days of the funeral in Washington and the last ceremony in Canton. Physically wearied from all that he had undergone during those tragic days, depressed in spirit, he returned to his home late that evening and found waiting there the representative of one of the most prominent publishing houses in the world. I do not pretend to give a verbatim account of the conversation that followed, but in substance it is accurate.

The $100,000 Contract

Mr. Cortelyou's caller introduced himself and stated that his house wanted Mr. Cortelyou to write a life of President McKinley, which was to be the only official and authentic biography. Because of his intimacy with the late President, because of his knowledge of the secret history of all the events leading up to the Spanish war and the diplomacy that followed it, because he possessed original letters and other material that no one else had, because of his literary ability and the confidence that the country had in him as an impartial biographer and historian, he had been selected for the task. Mr. Cortelyou could take his own time about furnishing the manuscript; all that the publishers wanted at that time was his signature to the contract.

This alluring offer was placed before Mr. Cortelyou with all the impressiveness that a skillful advocate, strong in the commanding position of his house in the publishing world, knows how to employ. As the climax, the agent told Mr. Cortelyou that his fee would be $100,000, to be paid to him so soon as he affixed his signature to the contract and it was accepted by the firm.

Mr. Cortelyou is not a rich man, he has a family of young children to provide for, and one hundred thousand dollars in a lump sum is a thing not to be despised by a sensible man who can make it honorably, and yet the offer, magnificent as it was, did not cause him to hesitate for a moment. He told his visitor that he could not entertain it for the simple reason that the thought of turning his intimacy with the late President and the confidence and trust that he reposed in him into money was abhorrent to him and nothing would induce him to do it. The life of President McKinley will be written at the proper time, said Mr. Cortelyou in substance, but that time has not yet arrived. Whoever writes it must do so as a labor of love and duty, as an historian who would give to the American people facts in connection with one of the most interesting periods in their national existence, and not because of the money that he may make from it; he must wait until time has softened some things and developed the proper perspective; until, in short, he can approach his subject in the attitude of the historian rather than the partisan.

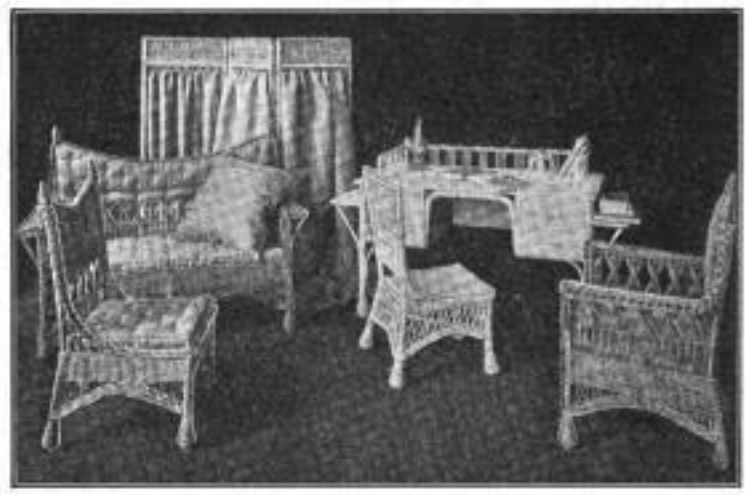
The agent made a feeble attempt to induce Mr. Cortelyou to reconsider his decision, but saw that he was inflexible.

That ended the negotiations.

This incident is the epitome of Mr. Cortelyou's character. Equally characteristic of the man is his surrender of $50,000 a year for $5000 because again he believed that it was his duty both to the living and to the dead to make the sacrifice, and it assumes all the greater proportions when one remembers that Mr. Cortelyou, being a sensible man, has a proper appreciation of money and all that money means. After the death of President McKinley three great corporations were anxious to secure Mr. Cortelyou's services, and one of them offered him a salary of $50,000 a year. They had gauged his executive ability and were willing to pay for it. But Mr. Cortelyou had in mind the mass of loose threads left hanging at McKinley's death which he alone could properly knit together. Had Mr. Cortelyou retired at that time almost endless confusion would have been caused, and designing men, taking advantage of the new President's ignorance, would have profited by it to the ultimate disadvantage of the Republican party. Mr. Cortelyou, realizing this, and deeply sensible of the obligations he owed to the man who was dead as well as those men living who had always been his friends, determined that even at his own cost he would remain with the new President, and what added to his determination was the request at once made by Mr. Roosevelt that he continue to fill the office of Secretary to the President.



Musician, Teacher, Stenographer, Secretary

This is one side of his character. There is another side—a side which few people except his most intimate friends know, and which shows that his intense practicality is tempered by idealism. After a term of study on Long Island—and parenthetically it may be remarked that there he met the girl who was later to become his wife; she was then merely a child, but with that steadfastness which has always characterized him he never forgot her, and when the proper time came he married the love of his boyhood days—he graduated from the State Normal School at Westfield, Massachusetts, and decided to make music his life-work. His love for music is inherited and has been transmitted. His father, though not a professional musician, was a distinguished amateur, and Mr. Cortelyou's children, although they are still quite young, have shown a marked talent for music. Mr. Cortelyou went to Boston and while still studying and earning a living devoted all his spare time to music, and as a student of a Boston conservatory applied himself diligently to acquire a musical education. After a year of hard work it dawned on him that the life was rather a narrow one, and that though it was a good thing for a man to have a knowledge of and a love for music, it was perhaps not the best profession to which he could devote himself. He felt then that he needed a wider field for his activities, and although the temptation was strong to be an artist he put it behind him and went to New York to get into the thick of the fight. In New York, after teaching in a stenographic school, he took the civil service examination and was then appointed stenographer to a post-office inspector.

He had no influence behind him; he was not appointed because some politician in high standing had asked for the appointment, but simply on his merits. As a stenographer he did so well that later he was transferred to a more remunerative place in the Post-Office Department in Washington, and here he remained until the second Cleveland Administration came in, when Mr. Maxwell was appointed Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, and Mr. Cortelyou in the ordinary routine found himself assigned as the new assistant's stenographer.

Mr. Maxwell was a Democrat and Mr. Cortelyou was a Republican, and in the circumstances Mr. Cortelyou had no idea of permanently retaining his place; in fact, it was his belief that inside of a month or so, when Mr. Maxwell had learned the run of his office, he would select a Democrat for his confidential man, and Mr. Cortelyou would be transferred to some other place. But Mr. Maxwell soon saw that in Mr. Cortelyou he had a most competent and efficient assistant. He made the discovery that other men have made since, that Mr. Cortelyou was almost invaluable to him, and that it would be extremely difficult to find another stenographer who displayed such ability and could so intelligently anticipate the thoughts of his chief. So Mr. Cortelyou remained with Mr. Maxwell, and soon Mr. Maxwell began to tell Postmaster-General Bissel of the great prize he had in his office. In that way Postmaster-General Bissel became interested in Mr. Cortelyou, and when a stenographer attached to the White House force resigned and President Cleveland mentioned at a Cabinet meeting that he wanted a good man to fill the vacancy, Mr. Bissel suggested Maxwell's prize stenographer and Mr. Cortelyou won another promotion.

The first time that Mr. Cortelyou was called in to take the President's dictation he considered it was proper for him to say to Mr. Cleveland that he was a Republican.

"Never trouble about a man's politics in a confidential position," was the reply. Mr. Cleveland was a good judge of men, and knew in whom to repose confidence. Mr. Cortelyou remained at the White House during the Cleveland Administration, and there, as everywhere else, won not only the respect of his superiors but impressed them with his ability and quick grasp of things. When Mr. McKinley entered the White House and appointed John Addison Porter his secretary Mr. Cortelyou was again promoted to the post of assistant secretary, and after the death of Mr. Porter he was made Secretary to the President.

To Young Men Beginning Business

Mr. Cortelyou speaks as follows to young men beginning business:

"If men spent as much time in doing their work and perfecting themselves in trying to do it still better as they do in endeavoring to secure political influence, and promotion on the strength of that influence, it would be much better for them, and their success would be more rapid." He added that his experience had taught him that in the Government service, as everywhere else, in the long run merit tells. Here and there, of course, luck or favoritism helps a man and for the time being he pushes rapidly to the front, but it is the old story of the hare and the tortoise. The man who wins in the race of life is the man who has staying qualities and who uses his brains. "The trouble with so many men," Mr. Cortelyou continued, "is that they are lacking in the essential qualities. For instance, you find a stenographer who may be a good stenographer in so far as he can take down the words you utter and accurately reproduce them, but who is simply a machine. If, for example, you should make an obvious mistake, or if, as so often happens in dictation, you use a plural where manifestly the singular is intended, the stenographer will transcribe it without having either the intelligence or the desire to make the correction or to call your attention to it. Again you find a good stenographer who has absolutely no initiative or no imagination. Give him the exact words to write and he will write them, but give him merely a skeleton and trust to him to dress it up, and the chances are that he will be unable to do it. Then there are the men who never appear to get into close touch with their superiors or to understand their idiosyncrasies, so to speak, who every day must be told the same thing and who only do just exactly what they have to do. Another class is composed of intelligent men who begrudge their work, and who think that when they are employed to do certain things they must not be asked to do any more. These are the men who show in various ways that they regard it as a hardship, and in fact as an imposition, to be asked to work half an hour overtime. Now, when you find a man who combines all the qualifications that are requisite he is bound to succeed. Men may think at times that their work is unappreciated, but good men are always in demand and the employer recognizes ability when he finds it."

The Reading Table

The American Way

MR. BOWEN has a way of assuming that others agree with him, that often gains him his point.

A staff photographer for a well-known journal sought audience with the Minister to Venezuela at the hour in Washington when several Ambassadors were to be in consultation with him on the question of preferential rights. The man wanted the photograph of all these distinguished persons sitting together. Foreign diplomats usually object to the American way of photographing important persons at important moments. This the photographer knew, and when Mr. Bowen told him to come right in and prepare his camera near the table and await the gathering of the men, the photographer hesitated, fearing to make an unpleasant scene.

"Do as I tell you," said Mr. Bowen, "and you will get the picture. Have everything ready for the final snap."

When Ambassador Herbert and Baron Speck von Sternberg had made the distinguished party complete, the Minister to Venezuela said as he waved his hand toward the camera: "This gentleman has asked to take a photograph of us. I told him that I had no objection to his doing so, and I assumed that you would not have any, either."

Snap went the button and the picture was taken and the camera down before the distinguished foreign Ministers thought it out.

A Case of Precedence

SENATOR GEORGE F. HOAR, the venerable Senator from Massachusetts, who has played so serious a part in the Upper House, has moments of clever small talk that make his wit as much appreciated in the drawing-rooms as in debate.

One of the delightful things he said was at a large formal dinner at the White House. As the guests were leaving the receiving-room the Hon. Charles Emory Smith was just in front of Senator Hoar. The ex-Cabinet Minister at once stepped aside and insisted that the Senator from Massachusetts precede him. There was a moment's polite parleying while Mr. Smith argued that a man in the Senate should precede an ex-Cabinet Minister.

"Ah, no," said Senator Hoar, bowing. "The X's precede the Y's" (wise).

Webster and the Highwayman

IN THE ante-railroad time, Daniel Webster once rode by night from Baltimore to Washington. Having no other companion, the great statesman, it is said, contemplated the face of the holder of "the ribbons," which had a very forbidding aspect, with much uneasiness. Ashamed of his suspicious fears, he had nearly reasoned them away, when the men came to the dark woods between Bladensburg and Washington, where he felt his courage oozing out at his fingers' ends as he thought what a fitting place it was for murder. Suddenly the driver turned toward him and gruffly demanded his name. It was given. Then followed the demand, "Where are you going?" "To Washington; I am a Senator," said Webster, thinking his worst fears were about to be confirmed.

A Popular Volume

"SENATOR LODGE," remarked one of his colleagues, "is naturally proud of Massachusetts, and is not disinclined to believe that children of that commonwealth have no superiors in any part of the country in the matter of mental equipment.

"Nevertheless he takes pleasure in telling a story of a Boston child who wrote to him asking him to procure a copy of 'The big volume of the Coast and Geodetic Report.'

"Senator Lodge was naturally pleased that a Boston child should make a request for a work which dealt in transcontinental triangulations and azimuths, but wishing to be certain in regard to the work desired he replied in a letter setting forth the contents of the various volumes of the latest report of this important branch of the Treasury Department, concluding his letter with the request that the applicant specify the particular book desired.

"'I don't care what reading matter the book contains,' came the naive reply; 'I want a big, fat book, good for pressing leaves.'"

The Columbus of China

DR. S. WEIR MITCHELL, the eminent physician and novelist, has had many honors conferred upon him, but he probably cares most for those shown him by the Mikado of Japan. This intelligent and progressive ruler asked that Doctor Mitchell be presented to him. The story has leaked out, from Americans living in Japan, that much of the enthusiasm of the Mikado for the writer was due to an inspired speech made by Doctor Mitchell when he was presented at the splendid Japanese court. It was just at that moment when China was in the limelight of the nations. When Doctor Mitchell was presented with all the great formality due to the Emperor, he said:

"It is the happiest moment of my life to meet the man who discovered China to the world."

The Sweet-Fern Cigarette

By Joe Lincoln

Oh, the sweet-fern cigarette!
Them old smokes we use ter get
When the world was all ter-morrow
And there warn't no words like sorter,
Work or debt;
Barefoot youngsters, nine or ten,
Puffin' just like grown-up men,
And a feelin'—land, yes! feelin'
Twice or more as big again.

Oh, the sweet-fern cigarette!
Lawsy! I remember yet
How we use ter roll and stuff 'em,
How we use ter light and puff 'em.
Proud, you bet!
'Neath the bushes in a row,
Dreamin' dreams and talkin' low,
Hopin' we looked old as father,
And just wishin' it was so.

Oh, the sweet-fern cigarette!
Seems if I can see it yet;
Wrapper—well, 'twant reel Havanner—
Tote out of the Weekly Banner,
Gossip's pet,
With the fern leaves rolled inside,
Crinkled, twisted up and dried—
Mebbe 'twasn't Manuel Garcia,
But, by jings! it satisfied.

Oh, the sweet-fern cigarette!
My! how plain I smell it yet
Mixed up with the scent of grasses
And of green pine-needle masses,
Dewy wet,
And of medders all ablaze
In the sunny August haze,
And the bayb'ries hot and spicy,
Sleepin' through the summer days.

Oh, the sweet-fern cigarette!
Lawsy! how I'd like to get
Somethin' somewhere with its flavor,
With its reel old down-home savor!
Like ter set
There behind the pastur' wall,
Free from years and care and all,
And blow smoke dreams with the fellers
That I knew when I was small.

Half-Price Music Club Closes

Write Today and Secure a Set at Half-Price

We have remaining on hand only a few sets of our special half-price Club edition of the "World's Best Music," and these will be closed out at a bargain to those who order promptly. If you send us your order at once you will be in time to obtain a set at half-price and on the little-at-a-time payment plan. Write us a letter today, enclosing the coupon cut from this advertisement, and a set will be forwarded to you, express prepaid, for examination. It will cost you only a two-cent stamp to examine this musical library, and decide for yourself as to its merits. The set contains 2,200 pages of the best sheet music—carefully selected by an experienced staff of music editors, headed by Reginald De Koven—and handsomely bound and indexed. If you were to buy it one piece at a time it would cost you over $200.00.

A Bookcase Free if You Order at Once.

The World's Best Music

This is the most comprehensive collection of music in existence. It contains 2,200 pages of sheet music—which is 950 more than any other Musical Library. It is fully indexed, so that any selection can be quickly found. The volumes are specially bound to open flat on the piano. All the world-famous composers are represented—including such names as Wagner, Liszt, Paderewski, Sullivan, Mozart, Handel, Chopin, De Koven, Strauss and Gounod—but the selections have been so carefully made that none is too difficult for the average performer. The work contains 300 instrumental selections by the best composers, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. There are 350 best old and new songs, duets, trios and quartets. Among the selections are 100 new and copyrighted pieces of music by American composers. As a musical cyclopedia it is unexcelled, for it contains 500 biographies of musicians and 400 portraits, many of the last being attractive art plates in many colors. The volumes are handsomely bound in art cloth and half-leather. In number of pages of sheet music, number of biographies, and in number of illustrations, this Musical Library leads all others.

Size of Volumes, 9 x 12 Inches.

$1.00 a Month Payments

If you are a pianist or a singer, or if there is a piano in your home, you should not let this opportunity pass, for it means music for a life-time at a trifling cost. Through our Musical Library Club, while the remaining sets last, the prices of this collection of music will be $21.00 for a set in cloth binding and $25.00 for half-leather binding—payable $1.00 a month. The value of this bargain can be shown by the fact that thousands of these sets have previously been sold for $35.00 and $40.00. This is your last opportunity to secure this magnificent work at a low price and on easy payments. Cut out the coupon and send it to us today. We will send you a set, express prepaid, for five days' examination. If you are not satisfied, return the books to us at our expense. But if you decide to keep the set, send us $1.00 at the expiration of five days and $1.00 a month thereafter until the full amount is paid.

BOOK-CASE FREE We still have in stock a small number of elegant oak-wood book-cases that are made especially to hold a set of the "World's Best Music." Their retail price is $4.00 each, but we have decided to offer them as premiums to prompt subscribers. To obtain a book-case free with your set, it will be necessary to send us your order before April 28th. If your order is received after that date, we cannot supply a book-case with the set, unless, of course, you care to pay the retail price of $4.00 for the case. This book-case is a present from us, and does not increase the cost of the music in any manner.

Getting On Young Men and Old in Business

The Man Who Took Advice Backward

By Charles Battell Loomis

THERE was once a man who loved to make money. He toiled early and late, and at last, by patient persistence and unwearying efforts, he amassed a fortune so much greater than he could possibly spend upon himself that the editors of those journals that are self-constituted balance-wheels on the body politic told him that it was time for him to stop; that it was criminal for him to pursue the dollar any further; that he should give a chance to others.

Now there are some types of millionaires who are not moved one whit by the arguments or the mockery of editors, but this millionaire was an exception. He went home and said to his wife: "I perceive that my amassing of money has been in the nature of a crime against society and it would be wickedness for me to gather together even so small a sum as a thousand dollars more. I have spent fifty years—happy years—absorbing money; now I will sit under my vine and fig tree and think over my work which I had not supposed criminal until the editor of the Daily Howler opened my eyes. I plainly see that I have been selfish: I will be selfish no longer. Let others make what they will; for me, I am done."

So he called together his lieutenants and helpers to the number of five thousand and said:

"I am this day minded to stop my selfish pursuit of the mighty dollar. The Daily Howler has shown me that it is no less than criminal for me to seek to make further money when there are so many men who are waiting to become millionaires. Go to your homes and do what you will; for you no more will the whistle sound, the great wheels will no longer revolve, the smoke of the chimneys will go up no more forever. Forgive me in that I did not sooner see my duty. I cannot unmake what I have made, but from this day forth my mills shall be as ruins and you my helpers shall be free to live your lives in your own way."

And a babe and suckling of two summers who had the gift of speech rose and said:

"It seems to my limited understanding that you take a wrong view of the case entirely. If you were making your money by your own individual efforts, unaided by others, or if your ways were merely those of a clutcher who buys and sells on a margin and whose work benefits none save his brokers, then it would be well to heed the advice of the Daily Howler and the other papers whose editors work for love, and put a stop to your money getting; but your prosperity means the prosperity of this entire community that has grown up around your mills. When your machinery is running overtime to coin money for you it is also providing extra wages for your superintendents and machinists and their subordinates, and it is enabling their wives to buy not only food but some of the things that go to make life something more than drudgery. Cut off the stream at its fountain-head and you yourself stop drinking of its waters of increase, and you doom thousands to a drought."

And the millionaire said:

"I'm blest if I know where you learned that song and dance, but it is covered from end to end with horse-sense of the best quality and I am glad you tuned up.

"The Daily Howler may join the other jackals, but as for me I will keep the wheels running and the smoke pouring and the whistles blowing until I am too old to do any more work."

And he made a cooperative company of the concern and increased the plant; so the Daily Howler did some good after all, for its advice was taken backward, which is often the best way to take advice.

View of New York City from Our Property.

NEW YORK'S MILLIONAIRES have, in many cases, made their fortunes in New York real estate. Shrewd business men are embracing the same opportunity to-day of securing a share in the tremendous increase of values of desirable property being opened up in the suburbs of Greater New York.

Our property,

GRANTWOOD-ON-HUDSON,

on the Palisades, opposite Grant's Tomb, has already become a beautiful suburb; has macadam streets, flag walks, curb, gas, water, unexcelled sewerage system, schools, churches, etc. Sixty new homes built in two years; more going up now. Only thirty-five minutes to down-town commercial districts.

Lots similar to those sold in 1899 for $450, now selling at $950. Values have since doubled, and should double again, in the same time. Two-thirds of this property has been sold.

Immediately west lies

where we have made the same improvements as at Grantwood. Large number of new houses, likewise new $7,000. R. R. Station, and beautiful Park, now in process of completion.

Lots at MORSEMERE, $350. to $700. At GRANTWOOD, $700. to $2,000.; as desirable for residential purposes as those sold for same price in Harlem or Bronx (in the upper part of New York City) ten years ago, which now bring from $4,000. to $20,000. each.

EASY PAYMENTS: $15. down and $5. monthly, for lots under $700.

These properties have already proven their profit possibilities; but to demonstrate our faith in their future increase, we will guarantee that if the actual increased value within two years from your purchase is not equal to 15 per cent. per annum on your cash investment we will refund the entire cash paid us, with interest at 6 per cent.

If interested, come to New York and visit these properties. We will pay your railroad fare. But don't delay. Take advantage of this opportunity at once. We strongly advise your reserving lots at once, as we will advance price of all unsold lots 10 per cent. within 90 days.

Write to-day for full particulars. Testimonials from buyers who have already sold at a profit, photographic views, etc.

How a Business was Saved

By Archibald W. Shaw

MANY a critical business situation has been brought to a successful issue because some employee refused to accept flattering "surface indications" as final and had the hardihood to question the desirability of certain lines of policy and practice which were held in high favor by his superiors and associates.

Repeated and insistent examples of this kind of a situation have been forced upon my attention, in the course of my experience as a professional business systematizer, until I have come to regard this inclination to reject surface appearances and dig deep into the basic situation of every department as one of the most valuable traits in any executive or employee.

About two years ago I encountered a striking example of this phase of business experience, showing how a good digger—and that means a good doubter—can save the day and turn practical failure into decided success if his advice is heeded by his employer.

A certain manufacturing concern in the West found itself doing a large business. It was very busy and apparently was making great strides in securing for its product a large place in public favor. Among those holding a subordinate executive position was a keen young man who was not easily satisfied by exterior appearances, but had the digging habit.

"You are doing lots of business," he told his superior. "Almost every week you are adding more help to the office force; your correspondence is steadily increasing, and apparently the business is right on the crest of the prosperity wave. But if you will overhaul everything and find out just where you stand, I'll miss my guess if you are really making substantial headway or satisfactory profits."

This rather startled the managers of the business, but the young man was so much in earnest that a careful and thorough examination into the affairs of the enterprise was made.

It verified every prophecy that the young "kicker" had made.

"Now," he continued, "I'm convinced that the leakage of profits is in the very department which is the pet and pride of the house—the one that brings the most correspondence, that calls for the most of the new help, that 'keeps things doing' and gives the place the busiest appearance."

"Nonsense!" replied the manager. "You were right on the general situation, but this time you are wrong. Why, that department is doing great stunts right along and any curtailment of its work would weaken the selling end of the establishment very much."

"But," insisted the digger, "I'll tell you right now that of the seven methods you are using to put your goods on the market the one which you think the best is the very one that is cutting down your profits. Call in an expert who is able to sift this matter right down to a finish and you'll find I'm right."

This was done with the result which verified to a letter the prediction of the young man. A careful analysis of the results of the seven means by which the goods of this house were placed on the market showed conclusively that the method held in highest esteem, and which made the most outward show of business, was the one which held the profits of the entire establishment down to an insignificant precentage.

Naturally this particular method of selling was at once dispensed with, and the final proof of the whole matter was found in the fact that many thousand dollars were, in the following year, added to the profits of the enterprise.

When any business house has in its employ a man who refuses to go "on the face of the returns" and insists that the establishment should have some method which will give it a simple, analytical and cumulative record of the actual results obtained by every department and line of effort employed, give that man a careful hearing.

His suspicions and "kicks" are worth being tested.

Their Ways and Their Work

THE KNIGHTE OF THE WOEFULLE COUNTENANCE — A serio-comic experience of Mr. Charles Battell Loomis.

¶ Charles Battell Loomis has a face which he describes as longer than an old-time Presbyterian parson's "fourthly." It makes the delight of his audiences when, with a true hired mourner's solemnity, he ties them up in tight kinks with some particularly deft turn of drollery. But not every one has the saving grace of humor.

When Mr. Loomis last lectured he was met by a very conscientious chairman who had been deputed to conduct him to the platform. The chairman looked at Mr. Loomis' long face and quaked in his shoes. The lecture was to be a humorous lecture—evidently Major Pond had shipped him the wrong bill of goods. Tremblingly the chairman assured himself of his guest's identity. Mr. Loomis "tumbled" at the first note of hesitation, but had the wickedness to rather enjoy the chairman's wriggles. Yes, he was to lecture that night—and he let out another reef in his solemnity.

"Will it—er—be funny?"

"I hope so," was the sad answer.

Mr. Loomis has recently taken on the duties and honors of a Justice of the Peace, it is laughingly asserted by his friends "on the make"—for "more copy."

A BROADWAY BRITON — What he thinks of us, together with a hint to the next conundrum novelist.

¶ A Southern gentleman once said, in criticism of the newcomers who are buying up old Virginia estates from reduced families, that the chief reason they don't get on better with the native-born is that they become "just a little more Southern than the Southerners"—we learn in Mr. Kipling's Jungle Book that the ape is never popular with the other animals. Now, if one were in any doubt of Mr. Justus Miles Forman's nationality it would be instructive to note that the English of his Englishman—"Young" Calthrop, the hero of Journey's End—is rather more English than anything one hears in England itself—by which one means that all the stock phrases now grown as familiar on this side the "pond" as the other, such as "shocking," "bounder," "jolly," "smart," "swagger," and the like, are rather more plentifully scattered through the soliloquies and dialogue than they would be in, say, the small talk of the Mayfair drawing-rooms where, it is supposed, Calthrop has the habit of them. And Mr. Forman makes his Englishman what an Englishman rarely is—however slangy—careless of his sequences and tenses—prejudices of which the well-bred Briton is jealously tenacious. "Young" Calthrop says: "I wonder if I were to go to you to-morrow and ask for tea—and things—if I'd get them. Oh, yes, you said I would" (the italics are ours) "whenever I should come; but would I?"—a double lapse of which we are sure his ear would never have permitted him to be guilty had he been born out of the Manhattan Island he so longed to leave for "home." The moment this suspicion steals across the mind it begins to dull the interest in what—were they genuine—a host of modest metropolitans would sagely nod over as his "clever," "observant," "profound" and "penetrating" criticisms of our manners—for whether the critic be all or none of these things he does not, cannot, if he approaches his subject from the inside, get the thing which is of interest to us the "critickees": the unspoiled, the outside viewpoint. It is too much like that tedious thing, the dread of all dinner-tables, what a man thinks of himself.

The plot of Journey's End is soon told. "Young" Calthrop at his father's death finds himself heir to an income which cannot support him. He comes to New York, gets a position at fifteen dollars the week in a photograph shop, and takes cheap lodgings. At the shop he falls in love with a picture of Miss Evelyn Berkeley, a young actress then starring in The Horse Guards, and the red-headed shop-girl falls in love with him. Inspired by Miss Berkeley's picture, he writes a play for her and shows it to a second-rate actor living in the same house with him. The actor takes it to "read," has it copied, carries it to Freehman, gets it accepted as his own and returns the first copy to Calthrop. Calthrop discovers the plot, establishes his identity

ORGANIZED IN ASSOCIATION WITH THE BOOKLOVERS LIBRARY AND THE TABARD INN LIBRARY — THE TWO LARGEST CIRCULATING LIBRARIES IN THE WORLD

How the Three Libraries Differ

The Booklovers is a library exclusively of new books. It catalogues all good new books as soon as they are published and delivers to the homes of its members the very books ordered. It has branches in every large American city, in the leading cities of Canada, and in London, England. Its annual membership fees range from $5 to $25, and at the present time it is circulating at least twelve million books a year. The Booklovers Corporation has a paid-up cash capital of $2,000,000. Membership in the Booklovers is wholly by invitation.

The Tabard Inn (named after the Old Tabard Inn of 1385, made famous by Chaucer in his Canterbury Tales) is a library of the best books published during the past ten years, including also a fair proportion of the very latest books and a good assortment of the best standard books. Branches of the Tabard Inn have been opened in hundreds of cities and towns. Members may exchange their books at any Tabard Inn station in the United States upon the payment of five cents. When you belong to one Tabard Inn library you belong to every such library in the United States and Great Britain.

The Bodley Club (named after Sir Thomas Bodley, who three hundred years ago founded the most famous library in all England) is a library on a wholesale basis; that is to say, the books are rented in bulk to individuals and to institutions. The central management has no control over the local membership. The parties renting the books let them out to patrons upon whatever terms they choose. The books are in every way the same as those supplied to the Tabard Inn libraries.

RED—BLACK—BLUE

The Booklovers books are cased in rich dark red cloth boxes; the Tabard Inn books are cased in black cloth boxes with a crimson band around the box; the Bodley Club books are cased in blue cloth boxes with a lighter blue band. The books are easily distinguished one from another.

THE BODLEY CLUB LIBRARY IS ADAPTED TO THE FOLLOWING TRADE

Town or Village Merchants

Put in the library as an attractive feature of your store. There is nothing so pleasing as a display of beautiful books. Send out circulars making every customer a free member. This will make it necessary for them to call regularly to make exchanges of books. Extend this privilege to country customers, so that they will be sure to call at your store when they come to town. If you wish to do so, you can charge a small annual membership fee or charge for each exchange or ask for a deposit against the loss of the book. The merchants who are putting in these libraries are doing it largely to attract attention to their stores. We supply (at cost prices) all kinds of circulars, blanks, and sample newspaper advertisements adapted to this class of trade.

Book and Literary Clubs

This library is very nicely adapted to the needs of book clubs, literary societies, women's clubs, Y. M. C. A.'s, etc. For special books or for the very latest books additional fees are charged. Books delivered to any point in the United States. The club or society may make its own local terms and regulations; we simply rent the books wholesale.

Schools, Colleges and Institutions

This new library idea is meeting with much favor among educational institutions of various kinds. We place a complete library in the school at a moderately small weekly or monthly rental. The books are exchanged for others at regular intervals throughout the school year.

Large Business Concerns

This new library is meeting with much favor among large merchants, banks, insurance companies, etc. Some concerns are interested in providing a library entirely free to their employés, giving the charge of it to some member of their staff who is interested in the welfare of their workers; other concerns find it to their interest to turn the library wholly over to a committee of the employés, allowing them to make a very small charge for the service, and using the income in this way for a fund to provide for the families of employés who are unfortunate or who are ill.

Summer Hotels and Resorts

This is an immensely popular field. Libraries of popular books adapted to the needs of summer guests are already installed in many leading hotels. The library with its beautiful revolving book-case can be made an attractive feature of the hotel furnishings. Private parties can make good summer money by placing libraries at good points under their own personal management.

The BOOKS are the very best which have been published during the last two or three years in all lines of literature. A pleasing range of titles is selected for every library so that all variety of tastes may be met. Every book sent out has the sanction of the Editorial Committee of THE BOOKLOVERS LIBRARY, and is guaranteed to be a suitable book for general circulation. The concern renting the library has absolute freedom as to how the books are to be used. The management will help in carrying out the details of any plan which may be devised. The books are rented by the year, and when the contract expires, the concern renting the books is expected to return the original number, or if books have been lost, to pay for the lost books at the net rate of 75 cents each.

ATTRACTIVE ADVERTISING MATTER OF EVERY KIND SUPPLIED

We supply you at cost prices with subscription blanks, library stationery, membership tickets, booklets, posters, newspaper advertisements and reading notices with attractive cuts—in fact everything necessary to assist you in making the library a large success. The local shop-keeper who is so fortunate as to secure a Bodley Club Library for his store will have an advertising prestige worth hundreds of dollars.

WE HAVE A VERY SIMPLE RENTAL PROPOSITION

The libraries are rented in sizes from 25 books to 5000 books; 250 books make a very attractive library; the rental for this size is $4 a week. By our monthly exchange plan new books are delivered regularly and used books returned. In this way your stock is kept constantly renewed.

The first application from a town or village will have the first consideration. Send for blank form of application. If you care to send one dollar we will send you a sample book and a complete set of circulars, booklets, etc. Address:

with the manager by producing the original longhand manuscript, has the play produced with great success and—suddenly wakes to find that two unexpected deaths in the family have made him Earl of Oxbridge.

Now does he marry Miss Berkeley—who it is perfectly plain is Miss Ethel Barrymore, just as The Horse Guards is her last year's play, Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines—or does he go back to Molly, "the girl he left behind him"? The Lady and the Tiger over again. Why could not such a plot be made just six times as interesting and just six times as original by having six times as many young women, all drawn from the life, to fall in love with? Think what an ingenious guessing contest a well-advised book-boomer could work up from such material as that! The Early Loves of an Earl, or Eny Meeny Miny Mo, Catch a Princess by the Toe, or A Baker-Baronet's Dozen—Who Got the Bun? Why, David Harum, The Crisis and all the other Big Sellers would be lost in the dust.

WHO SHALL EDIT THE EDITOR?—Some instances where, in his differences with authors, he has come off second best.

¶ How far shall the editor edit? is a question much vexed by publisher and author. The discerning editor is alive—if, as some authors will have it, not from sympathy, at least from the spur of sharp competition—to any spark of merit, any sign of promise in an unfamiliar manuscript. He accepts it and is ready for the thankless task of whipping it into shape. He then performs a service to publisher, reader and author alike. On the other hand, the author's judgment often has the better of the argument. There is on record—if not here on earth, at least in Heaven above—the case of an earnest and ambitious young American writer whose book was accepted by an American publisher, and then suppressed on the ground of immorality. The publisher had accepted it at the instance of his literary adviser, and found no evil in it himself; but his wife, who saw the proofs, cried out against it. The indignant author demanded to know how far such interference was to be carried, if the cousins to the third generation, the sisters and the aunts, were to be invoked in counsel; but the publisher was obdurate, and the book, though legally brought out according to contract, was never pushed, and fell dead on the market. Fortunately it found an English publisher and great favor with the English critics, but to this day the name on the title-page is little known in this country. Then there was the author who had the refusal of his short story (an excellent story it was, too) from every editor in the land, until in later years he became an editor himself and turned the tables on his colleagues by publishing his story, under the title of A Rejected Manuscript, in his own magazine. This recalls the unkind criticism once made of Mr. Richard Watson Gilder's poetry: that it owed its vogue to the fact that it was acceptable to the editors of the Century Magazine.

Mr. George Horton had an unusual experience of a rather more fortunate nature. His Like Another Helen was three times accepted. In the first two instances the publisher insisted on substantial alterations, and in both instances Mr. Horton was equally firm for the integrity of his text. The book finally came out as it was written and the results seem fully to have justified the author's judgment. Mr. Horton has followed letters from his first years. He wrote, when he was twelve years old, what he asserts was an exceedingly bad satire in verse on the ludicrous fashions of the hour in women's dress. Throughout his course at college he kept strictly to the humanities. When he received his appointment as United States Consul to Athens he directed his studies to modern Greek. Greek has shown itself one of the great, vital languages. The educated Greek of to-day reads the Greek classics almost as we read Shakespeare; and Homer, though he wrote in a highly artificial language of literary convention, is as intelligible to him as, say, Chaucer is to us. The cry of kindling wood heard in the streets to-day is essentially what it was in the time of Æschylus. In this flexible, virile language has grown up a body of popular balladry and nouvelles. It was a congenial field for a man of taste and scholarship. The rendering into English which followed instantly caught the ear of English-speaking Greeks; and to-day at any picnic of American Greeks where dancing and ballad singing are part of the entertainment, one is quite as likely to hear Mr. Horton's translation as the original. He is perhaps the only living American poet who shares with Poe and Whitman the honor of an equal affection in the hearts of a foreign audience.

Deafness Overcome

Louisville man originates a simple little device that instantly restores the hearing—fits perfectly, comfortably and does not show.

190-page book FREE: tells all about it

Since the discovery of a Louisville man it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube or any such old-fashioned device, for it is now possible for any one to hear perfectly by a simple invention that fits in the ear and cannot be detected. The honor belongs to Mr. George H. Wilson, of Louisville, who was himself deaf and now hears as well as any one. He calls it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, is built on the strictest scientific principles, containing no metal of any kind, and is entirely new in every respect. It is so small that no one can see it, but nevertheless it collects all sound waves and diverts them against the drum-head, causing you to hear perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the hearer irritation, and can be used with comfort day or night.

It will relieve deafness whether acquired from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gathering in the ear, shocks from artillery or through accidents. It not only relieves, but stays the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. It does this in a simple, sure and scientific way. The effect is immediate.

Let every person who needs this at once send to the company for its 190-page book, which you can have free. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains many bona-fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India. These letters are from people in every station of life—clergymen, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from the use of this wonderful little device. You will find among them the names of people in your own town or State, and you are at liberty to write to any of them you wish and secure their opinion as to the merits of the only scientific ear drums for restoring the hearing to its normal condition.

Write to-day and it will not be long before you are again hearing. Address, for the free book and convincing evidence,

Oddities and Novelties of Every-Day Science

HARD TO SWALLOW—Fruits that never grew on trees, and jellies that would make the fortune of a mining prospector.

GOVERNMENT chemists in the food laboratory at Washington have been subjecting American jams, jellies and preserved fruits to analysis. The discoveries made are astounding.

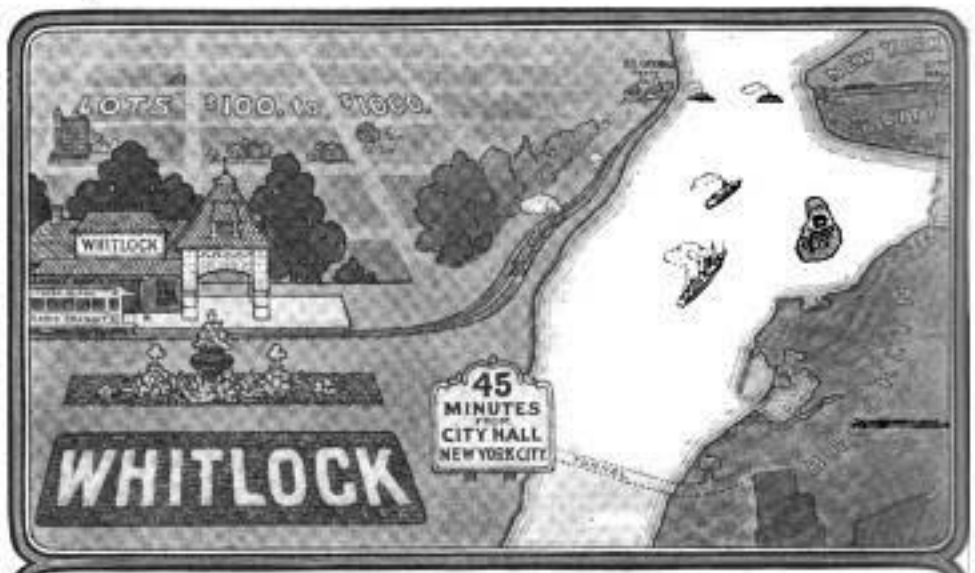
Of two hundred and fourteen samples of fruit products one hundred and four were found to be adulterated.

Crystals of acid tartrate of potash were discovered in plum jam. In many samples of jellies benzoic acid and salicylic acid had been used as preservatives. But that was not the worst feature. As permanent color is an important item in the sale of fruit products, some of the manufacturers had used poisonous dyes, and as a result small quantities of zinc, copper, tin, lead, arsenic and other dangerous impurities had been imparted to some very attractive looking jellies.

As stated, some of the samples were found to be pure, and the Government will circulate a list of the two hundred and fourteen brands examined, giving the name of the manufacturers, the claims of purity made for the product, and the disclosures of the Federal laboratory. Some of the jellies were found to contain scarcely any fruit substance at all, being composed of glucose, starch, coal-tar dye and other ingredients, with a mere flavoring of fruit.

It has long been generally suspected that fruit products contained many kinds of adulterants. The chemists in their search found in their jelly samples every alien substance that to their knowledge had been charged against jam and jelly, with one exception. The most careful tests failed to disclose agar-agar (dried seaweed), which it was thought was used as a gelatinizing agent.

In one sample benzoic acid was found in guava jam. The chemists were informed that it had not in that case been used as a preservative, but had come from a coal-tar dye which the manufacturers had purchased in good faith as a harmless vegetable coloring.



Twenty-five samples of jellies contained glucose, but were not so labeled. The labels of some of these not only disavowed the presence of glucose, or were silent in regard to it, but set forth that the product was packed from the choicest fruit. In addition to containing glucose, five had been dyed, and nine contained acid preservatives.

THE SERVICE OF HAWKS AND OWLS—They eat great quantities of gophers, rabbits, field mice and lesser vermin.

FOR years owls and hawks have been under the condemnation of the farmer. Now scientists come forward in defense of these birds of prey, asserting, after years of field experiment and investigation, that the activity of owls and hawks is of very great service to husbandry. Special encomiums are heaped upon the great horned owl (Bubo virginianus). But for its vigilance, say the ornithologists, the depredations of the cottontail rabbit would know no limit. The Biological Survey deplores the fact that the rabbit, which is held to be a great nuisance, is protected by law, whereas bounties are offered in many States for the extermination of owls and hawks, now declared to be among the farmer's real friends. In counties of Scotland, England and other countries where owls and hawks have been practically exterminated in the supposed interests of game preservation, it frequently happens that meadow mice devastate crops and destroy young fruit trees by girdling them. To avert a similar tendency in America the Government scientists will attempt to convince the various State authorities that most of the species of owls and hawks in this country are beneficial.

An object-lesson was presented on a farm near Washington. In a nursery of four thousand apple trees near farm buildings which hawks and owls do not dare approach, rabbits destroyed two thousand trees. In a newly-planted orchard distant from the buildings and surrounded by woods, hawks and owls afforded such complete protection that scarcely a tree was touched.

The occasional descent of hawks upon barnyards is a slight offense, the scientists say, when their great service is considered. There are seventy-three species and subspecies of owls and hawks in the United States, and a recent examination of the stomachs of about three thousand of these showed that only six of the seventy-three species are to be classed as more harmful than beneficial. Mice, rabbits, gophers and ground squirrels

8 Ever Blooming ROSES WITHOUT MONEY

TO get you interested we will send you, all charges prepaid, the following eight roses: They are not cheap, common roses; they are the choicest and most famous varieties. They are healthy, well-rooted plants; well packed, and we guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition; accompanying each lot of plants there are full directions for planting, care, etc.

CLIMBING METEOR—It has been called perpetual blooming, climbing, General Jacqueminot. It is a free, persistent bloomer, and will make a growth of from 10 to 15 feet in a season; in bloom all the time. Its flowers, deep, rich red and are much larger than Meteor and are richer in color. It is just the rose to train up the veranda or around windows.

THE BRIDE—The largest white ever-blooming rose grown. The color is a delicate creamy white, very full flowers, measuring from 3½ to 4 inches in diameter.

DUCHESS DE BRABANT—This rose combines exquisite perfume, beautiful coloring and a matchless profusion of flowers and foliage. Soft, light rose, with heavy shading of amber and salmon.

BRIDESMAID—The bud is of exquisite shape and contour, so solid and firm, and stems are so long and stiff that no other rose will compare with it in keeping qualities after being cut. It is a bright pink, and is the same color all the time, under every condition of the weather and surroundings.

CLOTHILDE SOUPERT—It is a strong, vigorous grower. The flowers are large, double and beautiful in form, borne in sprays, and the color blends from a soft shell-pink to a pure satiny white.

THE UNIQUE ROSE, MME. FRANCESKA KRUGER—The striking color of this handsome rose places it at once in the front as a bud producer in the open air. In its shading of deep, coppery yellow it stands unique and distinct from all others. The flower, when open, is of good size and very symmetrical. One of the finest roses to plant in masses and clumps.

SAFRANO—Bright apricot-yellow, changing to orange and fawn, sometimes tinted with rose; valued highly for its beautiful buds; fragrant and a rampant grower.

MARIE VAN HOUTTE—Pale yellow, edge of petals often lined with rose, well formed, of good habit, and in every respect a most charming sort. The finest Tea Rose for outdoor culture.

All we ask of you is that you secure a club of three yearly subscribers for WOMAN'S WORLD at our special combined club rate of 50 cents for three yearly subscriptions. Send the names and addresses of the three subscribers and enclose 50 cents, and we will have shipped you at any time you desire the set of eight beautiful roses as described above, carefully packed and all charges prepaid. The regular club subscription rate for WOMAN'S WORLD is 25 cents, but we are making a special combined rate of 50 cents for three subscribers on this offer. We are making this extraordinary offer to introduce WOMAN'S WORLD, which is the best illustrated magazine ever published at a popular price.

Remember, you can secure for us as many subscribers as you can, and for each club of three we send you another set of 8 beautiful roses, as described above, all charges paid. Begin your work at once. When sending your clubs, state when you want to plant, and we will have the roses sent at that time. Copies of WOMAN'S WORLD sent you on request. Address

THE PERFECT WRITING MACHINE

Would be that typewriter which would combine the Best Features of all other typewriters. Every standard machine has some distinctive features that are valuable, and if these features could be united in one typewriter, then naturally that would be the best. Competent judges say that the Fox Typewriter unites more of these than any yet produced.

THE POSTUM CEREAL CO., Ltd., BATTLE CREEK, Mich., say: "We have fifteen typewriters of the various standard makes throughout our offices, and inquiry among our stenographers develops the fact that they are all of one accord, and that is, the Fox Typewriter is, in their judgment, the best all-around machine of the entire lot. They state that they can write for hours on your machine without fatigue, on account of the ease of movement, its simplicity, excellent arrangement of keyboard, accuracy of alignment, and the great convenience for raising and lowering the shift key. We will replace all other typewriters with the Fox, and we have reached this conclusion after years of experience with all of the best makes."

Our free trial plan will enable you to prove it yourself, regardless of what competitors say. Let us show you "THE FOX" before you buy.

comprise the chief diet of the larger species, while insects injurious to agriculture are devoured by the smaller.

The rough-legged hawk (Archibuteo lagopus sancti-johannis) seems to have earned its imposing title, for it is declared to be an uncompromising enemy of weasels and shrews, and of every rodent and insect which makes war on husbandry. This bird is among the largest and most beneficent of hawks.

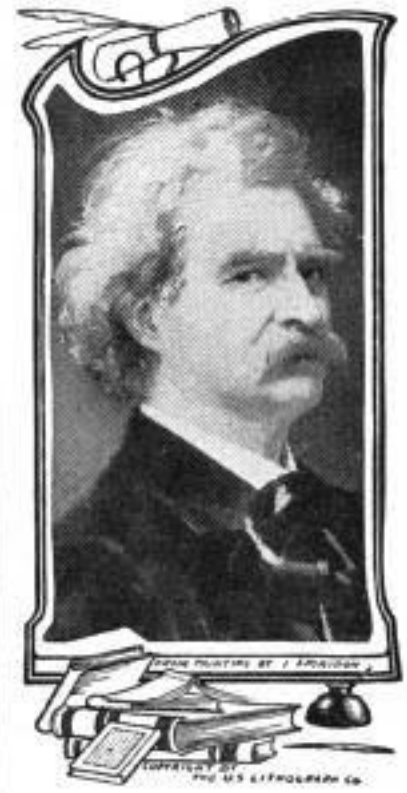
As if in its wisdom the owl had known that it would ultimately be defended by science, a pair of barn owls (Strix pratincola) for years have had their eyrie in the tower of the Smithsonian Institution. Scientists have on repeated occasions climbed to the place of banquet of these sapient birds, and up to date have gathered there skeletons of about two thousand mammals, most of them of meadow mice, one of the most destructive enemies with which farmers have to compete.

TO SAVE THE TERRAPIN — Sixty years ago terrapin sold for five cents apiece, now they are almost extinct.

IN THE interests of the United States Government Dr. Hugh M. Smith, an eminent ichthyologist, is now on his way to Japan to learn the secret of the artificial propagation of terrapin which expert fishermen in the Sunrise Kingdom have long practiced. When Doctor Smith returns the Japanese method will be adopted on the Atlantic seaboard to save the diamond-backed terrapin (Malaclemmys palustris) from extinction.

Sixty years ago this species of chelonian was so numerous that apprentices, when signing articles of employment in various industries along the Chesapeake coasts, stipulated that they were not to be fed on terrapin more than three times a week. Now if they could get that dish three times a year they would consider themselves fortunate. In the days of the terrapin's abundance they could be seen in vast numbers sunning themselves on various Atlantic tide lands. Until 1849 they were caught only for local consumption and were not highly esteemed by farmers and fishermen who could capture them with little effort. In the year mentioned a captain who happened to know their gastronomic value caught over four thousand and succeeded in selling them for $750. When this news reached the tide lands there ensued a mighty scramble for terrapin, and a new industry leaped into persistent activity. In winter, when the terrapin lay torpid in their mud burrows, dredges towed by vessels harvested them by the thousands. In summer, when they moved about in search of food, they were trapped by the wholesale. When they became too wary for traps they were hunted down by hounds on the marsh lands.

The result is that the diamond-backed terrapin is approaching extermination. To-day the best specimens are sold by the fishermen at $120 a dozen. State laws against their capture out of season are not rigidly enforced, and as the safeguarding of the species is not in the hands of the Federal Government, the one hope of preserving the terrapin lies in propagating them artificially.



Doctor Smith says that the species varies greatly in external appearance and in flavor. The best are found in the Chesapeake. Curiously, though most of the terrapins further south are much inferior, there is a strip of sand bar near Biloxi, Mississippi, where the terrapins are almost equal in flavor and value to those of the Chesapeake.

A factor which has contributed to the alarming decrease of terrapin is their slow growth. The rate is estimated to be about one inch a year, fully ten years elapsing before maturity. Just what food the terrapins eat in their natural state is not known. When penned they are fed on crabs, oysters and fish, and just before they are marketed celery is added to the diet to impart a choice flavor. Doctor Smith says that altogether little is known scientifically in regard to the species, and that there is no instance on record of a diamond-backed terrapin being raised by artificial methods from the egg.

In Japanese waters there is a terrapin closely allied, it is believed, to the American snapping turtle. It is deliciously edible, and as the Japanese were confronted by its threatened extinction they have managed to master the science of its cultivation. Scientists in America are looking forward with much interest to the information Doctor Smith will bring back. It is one of the few instances of Anglo-Saxon learning going to the far East for scientific instruction.

Mark Twain's Writings

Mark Twain's permanent place in literature has long been assured. Such critics as Professor Brander Matthews and W. D. Howells place him in the company of Chaucer and Fielding, of Molière, Cervantes and Le Sage. His Mississippi River tales alone stamp him as a master. And he has not only pictured for us forever the great Southwest, but he has given us a full spectrum of the Union with accurate and fascinating glimpses of Europe and the far East. He is acknowledged to have the largest audience of any author now using the English language. He is, in a word, a writer of world-wide celebrity, as instructive as he is interesting and entertaining, and there is a great and growing demand for his works in complete and enduring form.

Superb Riverdale Edition

(COMPLETE IN 22 VOLUMES)

Ever on the alert to please our book-public, and always anxious to popularize our book store, we have succeeded in securing a portion of the recently published de luxe edition—the "Riverdale"—in 22 volumes. This edition is limited to 625 registered and numbered sets but we were able to secure only about one-third of this number. The volumes are a delight to the eye; the illustrations are photogravures (many of them hand-painted) from sketches by the very best American artists—by such men as Frost, Smedley, de Thulstrup and Newell—but you should see the work in its entirety; for inspection alone can convey an adequate idea of the beauty of the volumes and of the fine appearance they will present in your library.

(THEY'LL BE QUICKLY CLAIMED)

It goes without saying that these few sets of so fine an edition of so great a writer will soon be transferred to the shelves of discriminating book-lovers, especially as the work is offered through Our Library Club whose members secure the sets at a discount of more than one-third from the regular price—at only $49.00 instead of $77.00. Moreover, club-members who so desire can make payments at the rate of only $4.00 a month, allowing them a full year, with immediate delivery of the entire set.

The 22 Volumes Sent Free on Approval

(ALL TRANSPORTATION CHARGES PAID BY US)

We earnestly desire our out-of-town book-public to share in this exceptional offer and we will send you the entire set on approval, charges prepaid; you may retain them 5 days for examination and decision, which we are confident will be favorable, in which case you simply send us $1.00 club fee and your first payment may be made 30 days later. If for any reason you do not wish to retain the set you may hold same subject to our order.

EARLY LIFE

The stone façades of houses, picture galleries, the sculpture of public buildings and monuments, the clever arrangement of gardens, all these things have very rarely captured my attention. That which appeals to me, and which I am always searching for, is the soul which is concealed behind the silent immobility of things; it is life and movement which interest me. I have spent hours contemplating a crowd, studying its agitation, taking note of its continual motion. And what life, what movement, what a crowd there was there before me in this Paris, which is the brain of one of the leading countries of the world and toward which came ebbing all the passions, all the anger, all the aspirations of a whole race and of a whole nation. . . .

Count Kolowrath did not abandon me, but introduced me to some of the influential French persons with whom he was on friendly terms. Among the number was M. de Falloux, who, later, was to have such an admirable career as a statesman and who was the veritable organizer of Public Instruction in France. M. de Falloux was very curious about men and things in foreign lands; he always talked willingly with me, and he invited me to private literary gatherings, at which lectures were given on the most varied subjects. One day I received from M. de Falloux an invitation card, on which were the following words: "M.——(a name which I have forgotten) will speak on literature in Germany and Provence." I went to this soirée and, on arriving, I found M. de Falloux, usually so calm and so reserved, in a great state of excitement and nervousness.

I inquired what was the matter.

M. de Falloux told me that his lecturer had not yet arrived and that he feared he would not now come.

"I am very much annoyed," he said, "as several of my guests have been looking forward to hearing him discuss this question, and I fear they will be disappointed."

An idea flashed through my mind.

"Why not get some one immediately to take the lecturer's place?" I suggested.

"That would not be very easy," replied M. de Falloux.

"Will you let me try?" I asked. "I know very little about Provence, or, to speak frankly, I don't know anything at all, but I am very well up in German literature, and I would do my utmost not to bore your guests."

M. de Falloux smiled. He was very much amused.

"Agreed," he said; "and I am very much obliged."

I Become Professor of Foreign Literature

Five minutes later, with plenty of assurance, I was discussing German literature and its connection with the literature of Provence. I compared, quoted and analyzed examples. I was witty, evidently, for my audience laughed a great deal; and I was even eloquent, for I was applauded.

When I had finished a lady approached me and in the most affected way said: "Oh! Monsieur, there are perhaps several things to find fault with in what you say about German literature, but all that you said about the literature of Provence was perfect, absolutely perfect. . . . One can see how thoroughly you know that country!"

Monsieur de Falloux, who was standing near, burst out laughing and then, shaking hands, thanked me heartily and drawing me aside said:

"What an admirable lecturer on foreign literature you would make!"

"If ever you become Minister," I answered, "I'll take you at your word, and ask you for a professorship."

"Agreed," he said: "yours shall be the first appointment I make."

And it happened as he had said, for M. de Falloux, on becoming Minister of Public Instruction, appointed the young man who had been seen having his pipe mended in one of the shops of Angiers to a professorship of foreign languages and literature in that very city.

I was not destined to stay very long in Angiers, though, nor in the University. In 1856 I was appointed to the chair of foreign literature at Marseilles. It was there that I met the lady who became my wife, and who, as the companion of my life for thirty-five years, was with me always through good and through evil days. She was French, and her father, M. Arnaud d'Agnel, had been paymaster in the Navy; her uncle, on her father's side, had been a Brigadier-General. Her mother belonged to an old aristocratic family of the Var, and her maternal uncle was connected with the Bourbon family.

Our marriage took place in 1858, and it was not until twelve years later that I embraced the career which was to be the veritable passion of my life.

Some of these twelve years were spent in commercial affairs, for I had always had the mania of believing myself very clever in mechanics. I had invented a machine for combing flax at great speed. I began by buying a workshop large enough to hold the machine, and the next thing I did was to have the said machine constructed at great expense.

When everything was ready I gave a big fête in order to celebrate the success of my invention. Every one came from miles round, and more than a thousand persons were present. They all congratulated me, drank champagne, looked at the machine, and admired it.

When the reception was over, the guests gone, and the champagne glasses empty I thought the moment had arrived for trying the machine and setting it in motion.

As everything was ready and the steam up, I said to the engineer: "Go!" and I, myself, turned the tap which was to set it in motion. There was immediately a most formidable detonation. Everything blew up in the air, the window-panes were all broken, and I was thrown violently down whilst a great iron bolt struck my forehead.

I was picked up for dead and it was thanks to my wife's nursing that I was able to get about again three weeks later, cured of my wound and still more effectually cured of my industrial inventions. Never from that time forth have I attempted to set any machinery in motion.

It is with this incident that my reminiscences of early youth come to an end. It has required a certain effort on my part to recall them, first because I do not care to dwell on those far-off days of the past, and, secondly, because I have been obliged to put myself constantly in the foreground instead of speaking about the events with which I have been connected and the men with whom I have come in contact.

But, such as they are, without order and without cohesion, the few lines I have written may at least have a certain philosophical value. They will show that great results may sometimes spring from very slight causes, and that, in order to become a journalist of note in the world, very little is often all that is required . . . just a pipe to break at the right moment on a journey.

Editor's Note—This is the fourth in the series of M. de Blowitz's Recollections. The final installment will appear in an early number.

Americans of Today & Tomorrow

in their relation to the whole body of our laws and the established order into which they must go, if enacted into law, and work in unison and harmony. They are the product of men who come here determined 'to do something'—men who want to create the sensation of achievement. But achievement is mischievous unless it is effective—unless it works for the good of the great body of our people and the general betterment of the whole assemblage of our laws. So all of the brain power and nervous energy spent in concocting these impracticable measures is lost both to the man who conceives them and to the people he serves. If such men would only patiently wait and carefully study, and then after consultation work with others, contributing all of their energy to a common effort for the enactment of wise measures or the prevention of unsound policies the nation would be served and the usefulness of these men who now waste their talents would be increased quite beyond calculation." This talk of one of the sages of the Senate is worth reproduction here; and it is worth, too, the thoughtful

UP!

The erection of a modern "sky scraper" seems like a miracle. But before a stone is laid or a bolt tightened, every inch of the structure must have been planned in the trained brain of the architect. Then, from the moment the army of men start to work the cry is "Up! Up!" Time is money. Each day of construction means thousands of dollars of expense. Each day of occupancy of the finished building will yield thousands of dollars of rent.

"Every man is the architect of his own fortune." Your motto should be "Up!" "Excelsior!" "Higher!" Train your brains, plan your career, and make each day yield one stone toward the full structure of success. Lose not a moment in hesitation. Let us help you plan your future and rapidly rise.

Cut out, fill in, and mail the coupon. You will receive our advice by return mail.

meditation of every young American who would grasp that truth most needed at this hour and in the future by all Americans. After all, it was only a diluted form of that wisest pronouncement of that wise man, Paul—"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

I am not counseling timidity either of plan or of action on the part of Americans of to-day; I am pointing out merely how absolutely essential it is that the American of the twentieth century shall regulate his vigor and make himself the master of his own masterfulness. I would have him the director of his energies and not their slave. Let the American pour the tremendous power of his strength and his resources toward the accomplishment of great and worthy purposes. Let him not waste and dissipate his noble advantages, which, well conserved, well used and well directed, render him the very monarch of the world's destinies, now and far into a future so brilliant that it is dazzling.

There is no danger in pointing out that the very magnificence of our power, our location, our resources compels conservatism to be the dominant trait of the twentieth century American.

We are Abnormally Energetic

Let no one fear that the enthusiasm of American youth will thereby be harmfully repressed. If every preacher in America were to make conservatism the text of all his sermons for the next decade, and every platform speaker were to do the same, and all the editors were to make that word the theme of all their editorials—even if every mother were to teach her children, not the gospel of mere effort but of thoughtfulness and thoroughness, there would still be no danger that the American character would be unduly toned down. For, after all, there is something about us that is abnormally energetic. "Pardon me," said a Russian of world travel and experience, "but the soberest of Americans seem to me to be intoxicated." Observing the immense quantity of spirits which Englishmen—and of the better class, too—consume with apparently no effect, the question was put to an Englishman of letters who was also an English statesman of large reputation: "How can you Englishmen drink so much? If Americans drank only a small portion of the liquor you consume they would be intoxicated." "I think it must be the difference in our climate, for Americans seem to us constitutionally intoxicated. It appears to us that you have not the power of repose. I have observed your people closely in every section of your own country, and it is very rare when I find one who has time to think."

Whatever an Englishman says a Russian will always say the reverse; and whatever a Russian says an Englishman will say is quite the contrary of the truth. Yet here were two eminent and observant men making a common statement in almost the same terms.

A certain great ethnologist, now deservedly prominent in one of the best of American universities, delivered a lecture some years ago in which he sought to demonstrate that our climate produced abnormal perception and electric execution. Another American of age and reflection, now an ambassador to one of the great courts, declares that our phenomenal activity is due to our political institutions which give to every man boundless opportunity (and therefore alluring invitation) to make the most of his chances and endowments. It is not worth speculating as to the cause, but the fact is important. We have the impetuosity of impatience, and yet nothing is surer than that all of the cards which Nature has placed in our hands might as well be thrown away unless we play them with skill and design. Steady then, young American! Prudence! Thoughtfulness! Conservatism! Repeat these words to yourselves at the hour of rising and then repeat them at the hour of retiring, and measure your conduct during the day by them, and all the while know that the glory of our nation and your own success depends upon the degree to which your daily conduct measures up to those standards of truth and wisdom.

Thousands of Clients

Buyers and Sellers — Have Endorsed My Methods of Handling Real Estate;

WHY?

NOT because I asked them to do so: not because they have any personal interest in me. They have endorsed my methods for good, substantial reasons. They have endorsed my methods because I have proved to them my ability to sell real estate of all kinds in all parts of the country (either for them or to them) at satisfactory prices. What I have done for others I can do for you. In fact, it is quite probable that I can serve you even better than I have served others, because my business is steadily growing and my facilities for disposing of and supplying properties of all kinds are steadily increasing. I don't want you to take my word for anything. I don't want you to transact any business with me until you are absolutely satisfied that I can serve you, and serve you well. I believe that I can satisfy you on this point very easily, if you will give me the opportunity. The hard part is to get you to take the first step—to answer this "ad." You have probably seen my advertisements a hundred times and each time wondered whether I could do anything for you. But wondering doesn't accomplish anything. Why don't you sit right down now—this very minute—and find out just what I can do for you, and how and why I can do it? I will not give you a lot of theory. I will give you information based on years of practical experience and acquired by an expenditure of many thousands of dollars. If you want to sell any kind of a property (or business), no matter how large or small, or in what part of the country it is located, fill out the left-hand blank on this page and mail it to me to-day. I will then tell you how I can quickly turn your property into cash and will give you my terms for doing it. If you want to buy any kind of a property, in any part of the country, fill out the right-hand blank and mail it to me to-day. I will guarantee to fill your requirements promptly and satisfactorily.

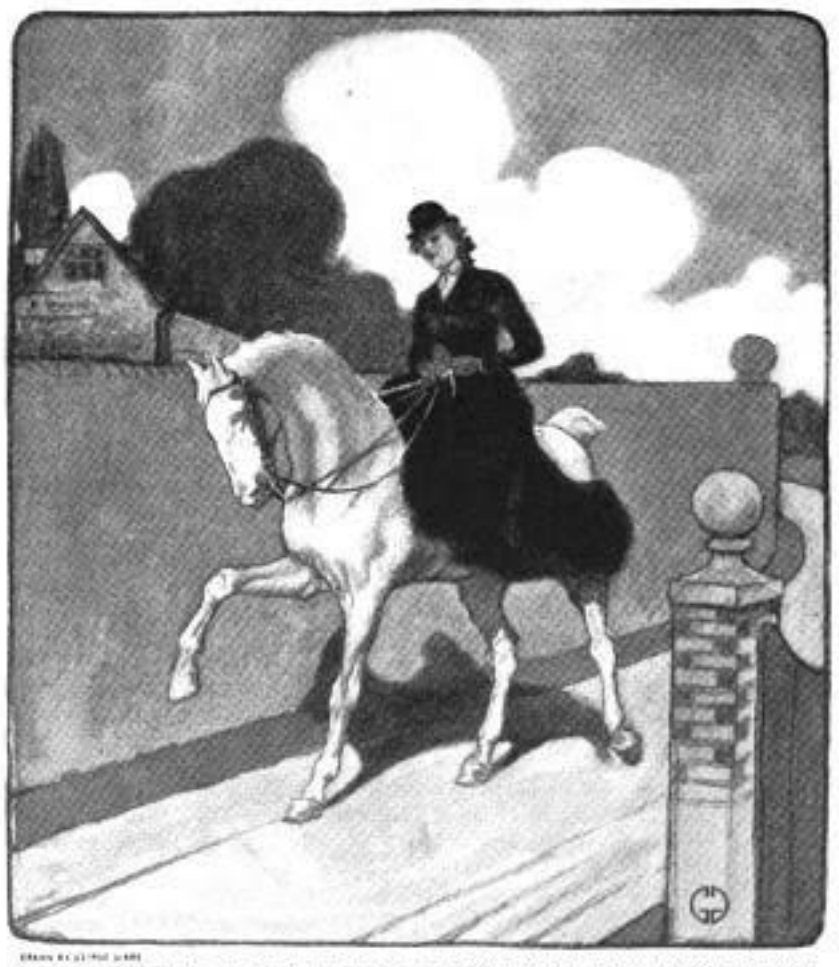
THE SCENE: Washington. THE CHARACTERS: Julian Crane, the new Member, and Geoffrey Thorndyke, his adviser; Senators Standiford and Bicknell, party bosses; the Secretary of State; Mrs. Hill-Smith, his daughter; Constance Maitland, much admired by Crane and Thorndyke; members of the diplomatic corps, and others. TIME: The Present.



CHAPTER I

CERTAIN aspects of Washington, both outward and inward, are like Paris. Especially is this true of the outward aspect on a wet night, when the circles of yellow-flaring gas lamps are reflected in the shining expanse of asphalt, when the keen-flashing electric lights blaze upon the white façades of great buildings, and the numerous groups of statuary against a black background of shrubbery, and when some convention or other brings crowds of people to swarm upon the usually dull streets. The Honorable Geoffrey Thorndyke, M. C., spoke of this Parisian resemblance to his friend, the Honorable Julian Crane, M. C., as they sat together on a warm, rainy April night in the bay window of Thorndyke's apartment. The rooms were lofty, wide and dark, according to the style of forty years ago, and overlooked one of those circular parks in Washington which fashion seemed only to have patronized briefly in order to desert permanently. But the rooms and the situation suited Thorndyke perfectly, and he had spent there all of the five terms of Congress which he had served. Thorndyke's remaining in that locality secretly surprised Crane, a man from the Middle West. He himself had an apartment in a modish hotel, which cost him more than he could afford and was not half so comfortable as Thorndyke's. But then Thorndyke was born to that which Crane was toilsomely achieving—for this vigorous product of the Middle West was sent into the world with enormous ambitions of all sorts, and not the least of these was social ambition. And combined with this social ambition was a primitive social enjoyment such as the Indian gets out of his powwows with unlimited tobacco and firewater. Crane, although bred on the prairie, cared nothing for fields and woods and the skies of night and the skies of morning. Men, women and their affairs alone interested him. Thorndyke, on the contrary, although town-bred, cared for the God-made things, and at that very moment was studying with interest the great tulip tree, dark and dank before his window. When he made the remark about Washington having sometimes a look of Paris, he added:

"And I expected to be in Paris at this very moment but for this"—here he interjected an impolite adjective—"extra session. However," he added good-humoredly, "I hardly expect you to agree with me, considering your late streak of luck—or rather, your well-deserved promotion, as I shall call it on the floor of the House."

Crane acknowledged this with a smile and a request for another cigar, if possible, not so bad as the last. He was tall and well made, and had a head and face like the bust of the young Augustus in the Vatican gallery. He was elaborately groomed, manicured and all, judging that time spent on beauty like his was not thrown away. In contrast to this classic beauty was Thorndyke—below, rather than above, the middle height, with scanty hair and light blue eyes, and who could not be called handsome by the mother that bore him. But when women were about, Geoffrey Thorndyke could always put the handsomest man in the room behind the door.

And he had a peculiarly soft and musical voice which made everything he said sound pleasant, even when he proceeded to make uncomfortable remarks about the late turn in national affairs which had sent Crane's fortunes upward with a bound.

"NO DAUGHTER OF THE CAESARS WAS EVER MORE CONSCIOUS OF THE GULF BETWEEN HER AND THE COMMON PEOPLE"

"For my part," he said, knocking the ash off his cigar, "I have lived long enough and read enough to know that such a stupendous opportunity as your party has now is generally fatal to that party before the next Presidential election. See—in the middle of a Presidential term—you carry the Congressional elections by a close shave. The new Congress is not expected to meet for thirteen months afterward. The Brazilian matter reaches an acute stage, and the President is forced to call an extra session in April instead of the regular meeting in December. Of course, the Brazilian matter will come out all right. Any party, at any time, in any civilized country, is capable of managing a foreign affair in which all the people think the same way. But when it comes to domestic affairs—my dear fellow, when the President saw how things were going and that he really could invite you to make fools of yourselves for the next fourteen months before the Presidential convention, it was beer and skittles to him."

Crane turned in his chair and sighed. The intricacies of national politics, the wheels within wheels, the way of putting out a pawn to be taken, puzzled and confused him. It had seemed to him the most unmixed political good to him when his party had secured control of the House at an international crisis. It could vote supplies with splendid profusion, it could shout for the flag, it could claim the credit for everything done, while the Senate and the Administration being in opposition, very little real responsibility attached to anything the House might leave undone. And when the man who was certain to be the caucus nominee for Speaker had sent for Crane at one o'clock in the morning and had offered him the chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee to succeed Thorndyke, Crane had felt his cup of joy to be overflowing. Everything was in his favor. Without the least doubt about his powers, which were considerable, he had some diffidence on the score of experience—but Thorndyke, who would be the ranking member of the minority on the committee, would help him out, quietly and generously. In the midst of his elation Crane remembered that Thorndyke had not been wholly satisfied with the chairmanship of that great committee—and Thorndyke had been suffered to exercise a degree of power far greater than Crane felt would be permitted him. On most Congressional committees there are two or three men who have come into the world booted and spurred, while the remainder were born saddled and bridled. Thorndyke was one of those who got into the saddle early, and yet the saddle had not seemed to suit him. Crane spoke of this, and bluntly asked the reason.

Digitized by Google

"Because," replied Thorndyke coolly, "there was no more promotion for me—and I was made to accept it whether I wanted it or not. You see, although the Constitution guarantees every State a republican form of government, all the States don't have it. Mine hasn't, nor has yours. My boss, however, is a good deal more astute than your boss. Mine never lets any man have what he wants. Unluckily, when I was a Congressional tenderfoot I wanted the earth and the fullness thereof, and I worked for it as well as I knew how. When the next nominating convention was held I was left out in the cold world. I waited two years. Then, being still green, with all the courage of inexperience, I went to my boss. I said to him that I wished to get back in public life, and to stay there—and he said——"

Thorndyke paused and blushed a little.

"Out with it," said Crane encouragingly.

"My boss has some extraordinary virtues—all real bosses have—among them a very engaging frankness. He said, without beating about the bush a moment, that it wasn't his policy to promote men who might—who might one day get a little too big for him. That was about what he said. He told me if I would be satisfied with a seat in Congress and the chairmanship of a good committee, I could have it as long as I kept out of State politics, and didn't make myself offensively prominent at national conventions. Then he proceeded to advise me as Cardinal Wolsey advised Thomas Cromwell. He charged me to fling away ambition, and reminded me that by that sin the angels fell, and likewise a number of very imprudent young politicians—I don't use the word statesman any more—all over the State. I squirmed, and the old fellow grinned and told me if at any time I hankered after a foreign mission I could get it. I thanked him and told him I had no fancy to be buried until I was dead, and at last we compromised on his first proposition. I like the life—God knows why. The salary is enough for me to live on and support an invalid sister—all I have in the world. I have sense enough to see that I am better off than if I gave a loose rein to my ambition and was forever chasing rainbows. A man without fortune, who lives upon the hopes of an office which will beggar him if he gets it——"

"That's it!" cried Crane, suddenly interrupting, his eyes lighting up with anxiety. "That's it, Thorndyke. I know all about it. I'll tell you the whole story—the story I never even told my wife——"

There is something touching and appealing when a man lays bare his wounds and bruises. Thorndyke, without saying a word, gave a look, a slight movement of the head that brought out Crane's story. He told it readily enough—he had the mobile mouth and quick imagination of the orator, and he was always eloquent when talking about himself.

"You see, when I got the nomination to Congress it was that or bankruptcy. For two months before the convention was held I'd walk the floor half the night, and the other half I'd pretend to be asleep, to keep my wife from breaking her heart with anxiety. Annette is a good woman—too good for me. I had neglected my law practice for politics until I had no practice left, and then I was transported to Congress and Heaven and five thousand dollars a year. I determined to do two things—cut a wide swath in Washington and save one-third of my salary."

"Great fool—you," murmured Thorndyke sympathetically.

"But—I didn't know what a wide swath was. I didn't know anything about it. I came to Washington and brought my wife and the two children. We went to a boarding-house on Eleventh Street—you called to see us there."

"Yes—I remember thinking Mrs. Crane the prettiest, sweetest woman I had seen that season."

This was true, for Annette Crane had the beauty of form, of color, of sweetness and gentleness to an extraordinary degree. She was no Perdita—no one would have taken her for a princess stolen in infancy. But not Ruth in the harvest field was more natural, more sweetly graceful than this lady from Circleville, somewhere in the Middle West.

"Annette admired you tremendously," continued Crane, in the easy tone of a man who knows his wife is desperately in love with him, and thinks her fully justified. "She said it was kind of you to call. Like me, she thought we were going to do wonderful things—I believe she used to pray that our hearts might not be hardened by our social triumphs. Well, you know all about it. We were asked to the President's receptions, and my wife called on the Cabinet officers' families, and at the houses of the Senators and the Representatives from our own State. We were asked to dinner at our junior Senator's house. I thought it would be grand. It was, in a way—the old man is pretty well heeled—but it was exactly like one of those banquets a Chamber of Commerce gives to a distinguished citizen. Annette was the prettiest woman there—but she didn't wear a low-necked gown like the other women, and that embarrassed her. In the end she found out more things than I did. She said to me before the season was over:

"'Julian, it's not being rich that makes people in Washington. If it were we shouldn't mind not being in it. But there are plenty of people, like the Senator, who have the money and the wish to make a stir socially—but they can't, while a plenty of poor ones do. Look at Mr. Thorndyke'—she hit upon you the first man—'he's asked everywhere, and he says he is as poor as a church mouse. No, Julian; to be as you would wish to be here needs not only the money we haven't got, but something else we haven't got and can't acquire; so let's give it up. Another winter I'll stay in Circleville—it will be better for the children, better for me, better for you'—for I own up to having been deuced surly all that winter. So we adopted that plan, and Annette has never been to Washington since. But—I'll confess this, too—I had from the beginning a fancy to see the inside of those houses where the people lived who make up this world of Washington. It wasn't merely idle curiosity. I was convinced, and I am so still, that the number and variety of people in Washington must make these Washington parlors—drawing-rooms you call them—the most interesting of their kind in the world. Well—I've got into some of them. It's a good deal easier for a man without his wife than with her—and Thorndyke, I own up, I am bewitched. Oh, it's not so much to you—you've known it too long, and seen too much of it all over the world to know how it strikes a man born and brought up until he is thirty-eight years old in Circleville. I swear, when I get a dinner invitation I am like the girls out our way, who will drive twenty miles in a sleigh to go to a dance. The mere look of the table—the glass, the silver, the flowers—goes to my head. And the conversation! They let me talk all I want."

"You are a vastly entertaining fellow in your own mental bailiwick," interjected Thorndyke.

"And the women! So unaffected—so unconscious of their clothes! And such listeners! I have never been to a stupid dinner in Washington. And the clubs—I never knew a man of leisure in my life until I came to Washington. I dare say you think me a fool." Crane paused, with a feeling rare to him that he could not express half what was in him—but Thorndyke's knowledge supplied the rest.

"No, I don't. It is quite as you say—but you are taking it all too seriously."

"Circleville," murmured Crane.

"Well, three-fourths of these people you admire so came from Circlevilles. Forty years ago, how many of them, do you think, had a servant to answer the doorbell? Just consider, my dear young friend, that, except in the South, servants were unknown to a large proportion of the American people until a short time ago. The parents of these people you see here, with eighteen-horse-power automobiles, and with crests upon their writing-paper, their carriages, their footmen's buttons, thought themselves in clover when they could afford a maid and a cook. So far, they are merely at the imitative stage. Their grandparents were pioneers and lived mostly in log cabins, and although the three generations are divided by only fifty years, it is as if æons were between them! It is one of the most astounding things in American life!"

"That's so," replied Crane. "It is said that one half of the world doesn't know how the other half lives, but in these United States about nine-tenths of the society people have no more notion how their grandparents lived than they have of life on Mars or Saturn. I went to a wedding the other day. It was magnificent beyond words. The two young people had been brought up in——"

"Barbaric luxury," Thorndyke interrupted. "It's barbarous to bring children up as those two were—I know whom you mean. The girl had her own suite of rooms almost from her birth, her own maid, her own trap. Even when there was an affectation of simplicity it cost enough to have swamped her grandfather's general store at Meekins' Crossroads, where he laid the foundation of his fortune. When she came out in society it simply meant more of everything. No daughter of the Cæsars was ever more conscious of the gulf between her and the common people—I say common people with the deepest respect for the term—than this girl is conscious of the gulf between herself and the class to which her grandparents belonged. The young man's story was the same, da capo, except that he was given a boy's luxuries instead of a girl's. It has been carefully concealed from them by their parents that their grandparents swept, dusted, chopped wood, traded at country stores, and did all those plain but useful and respectable things which made their fortune. To hear them talk about 'grandmamma' and 'grandpapa' is the very essence of simplicity."

"And yet those people constitute the most exclusive set in Washington," said Crane angrily, as if thereby some wrong was inflicted on him.

"Naturally," replied Thorndyke. "Don't you see that the first result of their prosperity in their own community was to segregate them from their less fortunate friends and neighbors? Don't you see how inevitably it came about that their children were separated from their neighbors' children? And in the end they were driven from the Circlevilles and the Meekins' Crossroads by sheer necessity. They became fugitives, as it were, from their own class, and how natural it was for them to be afraid of their own and every other class except the recognized few, and to build up a wall around themselves and their children!"

"I wonder if you would dare to use that word class on the floor of the House?" asked Crane.

"I would dare to, but I shouldn't care to," answered Thorndyke. "One reason why I have so little to say on the floor of the House is because it involves many explanations to men who know just as well what you mean as you do, and agree with you thoroughly. But there's Buncombe County to be considered."

"At all events," said Crane, returning to himself as a subject of consideration, "this social side of life appeals to me powerfully—too powerfully, I am afraid. I feel an odd sort of kinship with those old ladies of seventy that I see going the rounds in Paris gowns and high-heeled shoes, with their scanty white hair crimped and curled within an inch of their lives. It's serious business with them—and, by George, it's serious with me, too. Of course, I am a blamed fool for acknowledging so much."

"Not in the least. But you must know that it can only be a pastime with you. There are Circleville, and Annette, and the babies——"

Thorndyke saw Crane's face grow a little pale, and he fell silent for a minute or two, and while Thorndyke was watching the current of his thought, as revealed by a singularly expressive and untrained countenance, Crane burst out:

"The best in the way of women I've seen yet is Constance Maitland—I wonder why she never married? She's nearer forty than thirty—that she told me herself."

It was now Thorndyke's turn to grow pale. Constance Maitland was responsible to a great degree for all that had happened to him for the last eighteen years, and in all that time he had not seen her once, but the mere mention of her name was enough to agitate him; and she was in Washington and he had not known it——

It was a minute or two before he recovered himself and began to pull at the cigar in his mouth. Then he saw by Crane's face that Constance Maitland was something to him, too. Had the poor devil fallen in love with her as he had with Washington dinners? Thorndyke was disgusted with his friend, and showed it by saying coldly:

"I knew Miss Maitland well some years ago. She is very charming. But, Crane, it's bad manners to call ladies by their first names." Thorndyke used the old-fashioned word "ladies" where the moderns say "women."

Crane colored furiously. He did not mind in the least being coached in legislative affairs, but he winced at being taught manners. However, he had the highest admiration for Thorndyke's manners, so he replied carelessly:

"I accept the amendment. As you say, Con—Miss Maitland is very charming—and has been charming men for the past twenty years. Now, in Circleville she would have been called an old maid ten years ago."

Yes, of course, she had always had a train of men after her, and the fact that she remained unmarried showed either that she had no heart—or—sometimes a wild thought had crossed Thorndyke's mind—suppose Constance Maitland still remembered him? This thought, coming into his head, set his heart to pounding like a steam engine while Crane talked on.

"That woman epitomizes the charm of Washington to me. First, she is unlike any woman I ever saw before; that is in itself a charm. Then, she has an environment; that, too, is new to me. I went to see her four times last winter." Then he mentioned where she lived. "Her parlor—I mean drawing-room—was nothing compared with the others I'd been in here—but it was distinctive. It wasn't furnished from bric-A-brac shops and art-sale catalogues. All the antiques came from her own family—all the miniatures and portraits were her own kinsfolk. And, after having lived in Europe for twenty years as she told me—because she doesn't mind mentioning dates—and having seen more of European society than one American woman in ten thousand, she loves and admires her own country, and came back here to live the first minute she was free. That struck me all of a heap, because, though you wouldn't judge so from my Fourth of July speeches at Circleville, I should think that Europe would be something between Washington and Paradise."

"You haven't been there yet," was Thorndyke's response to this. And then Crane proceeded to tell a story which Thorndyke knew by heart.

"It seems—so I heard from other people—she was brought up by an old crank of a great-aunt who had married a Count Somebody-or-other in Germany. This old female party tried to make Constance marry some foreign guy, and when she wouldn't the old lady, in a rage, made a will, giving all she had to Constance on condition that she did not marry an American. It was thought the old lady wasn't exactly in earnest, but unluckily she died the week after, and so the will stands—and that's why Con—Miss Maitland never married, I guess."

Just then a band came blaring down the street, followed by the usual crowd of negroes, dancing, shouting and grimacing along the sidewalk, looking weird in the high lights and black shadows of the night. Crane, to whom the negroes had never ceased to be a raree-show, got up and went to the window, whistling the air the band played; meanwhile Thorndyke lay back in his chair trying to get used to the knowledge that Constance Maitland had been in Washington for months and he had not known it. There was a prologue to the story just told him by Crane—and Crane had no suspicion of this prologue. A young American of good birth but slender fortune—himself, in fact—was the primary cause of the old Countess von Hesselt's remarkable will. It was he whom the old lady held responsible for Constance Maitland's flat refusal to marry the son of an imperial privy councilor with seven points to his coronet. Oh, those days at the Villa Flora on Lake Como—those days that come only in youth, when the whole world seems young! When from the terrace Constance and himself watched the sunset trembling in the blue lake and making another heaven there! And those starlit nights when Constance and himself were in a boat alone together, and she sang to him to her guitar, and he repeated verses from Childe Harold to her! They were both young and singularly innocent, and were deeply in love—of that Thorndyke could never doubt; and because they were young and innocent and in love with each other the old Countess thought them the wickedest and most designing creatures on earth. She had spent all her life in Europe, had frankly married for a title, and wished Constance to do the same. The old Count—a helpless invalid—was not reckoned in the equation.

The Countess von Hesselt had acquired what many Americans who live abroad acquire—a spite against her own country. She had also forgotten a good deal about it, and thought a very effective way to keep Constance from marrying Thorndyke or any other American was to cut her off from a fortune in that event. The will was made, and the old Countess proclaimed it loudly for a week. At the end of that time the gentleman on the pale horse unexpectedly summoned her. There was but one thing for any man to do in Geoffrey Thorndyke's circumstances, and that was, to go far away from Constance Maitland. No definite words or promises had passed between them, but unless eyes and tones of the voice, and all sweet, unutterable things are liars, they were pledged to one another.

Thorndyke, being in those days a very human youngster, hoped that Constance would send him a line—a word—and doubted not for a moment that his love would make up to her for a fortune. But no line or word ever came. As years went on Thorndyke reached the sad knowledge that modern life requires something more than bread and cheese and kisses, and felt a sense of relief that it had not been in his power to take Constance Maitland's fortune from her with only love to give in return. But this knowledge did not make him content. On the contrary, year by year had her memory become more poignant to him. It was that which had made him throw himself with all his being and equipment into public life. It was that which made him tender to all innocent, sweet women like Annette Crane—innocent, sweet

The Castaway Brokers

"GENTLEMEN, PATRIOTS AND FELLOW-CITIZENS"

From the Almost Veracious Memoirs of Oliver Thumm

By George Randolph Chester

A RECORD OF THEIR ADVENTURES UPON NEW CHICAGO ISLAND, TOGETHER WITH SOME MENTION OF SILAS GREGG, T. JEFFERSON JACKSON AND A CURRENCY GOAT, ALSO SHOWING WHY THE REPUBLIC CAME TO BE A MONARCHY

TWELVE lives in all were saved from the wreck of the good ship Luzon. The captain, the gallant crew and the lady passengers all went down to very watery graves in the staunch new lifeboats. Silas Gregg, of Minnesota, nine members of the Chicago Board of Trade, and Thomas Jefferson Jackson, colored, came safely to land in the leaky old long boat the sailors would not trust.

Providence was probably interested in Silas Gregg.

The eleven men landed on a nameless island. It was Chicago Island thirty minutes later when the goat, the owner of the twelfth life to be saved, swam contentedly ashore with a cud of succulent sea thistles in its mouth.

It must not be supposed that the island had been named hastily or by any irregular method. On the contrary, the nine brokers, without waiting for their clothes to dry, had plunged into the great American diversion of moving, seconding and passing resolutions. When the goat arrived Jackson was serving the Committee of the Whole with refreshments from a breadfruit tree and had collected a dollar and ten cents in tips. Silas Gregg was not to be found.

By the middle of the afternoon Chicago Island was the home of a flourishing republic. Offices had been found for everybody present, including Thomas Jefferson Jackson, who was unanimously chosen as Sergeant-at-Arms. From that moment Mr. Jackson neither received nor expected any tips. He was content to do any and all the work if only addressed by his official title.

No republic was ever launched under more favorable conditions. From the reports of various committees it was gathered that the island was virtually an earthly Paradise, about five miles in diameter and uninhabited by savages, snakes or wild animals of a dangerous size. The character of the vegetation indicated a warm, equable temperature the year round, and there existed an abundance of nourishing food that needed only to be plucked, or picked from the ground as it fell. The geographical position could not be closely approximated, except that it lay somewhere in mid-Pacific, probably far south of the usual track of ocean travel.

II

SILAS GREGG emerged from the woods with a brace of wild turkeys for supper, just as the first Cabinet meeting was about to adjourn.

"Great Scott!" exclaimed the Secretary of War, "we've clean overlooked Silas! We must elect him to something or other. There is no reason why every citizen of this republic should not be an office-holder."

"Never mind me," said Silas cheerfully. "I don't hanker after any office. I've found a natural clearing, out yonder in the woods a piece, and I calculate to do a bit of farming."

"Mr. Speaker," cried the Secretary of State, "I move that the President be requested to appoint Mr. Silas Gregg, of Minnesota, U. S. A., as Secretary of Agriculture!"

"I object!" interrupted Silas. "In the first place, nobody ever heard of a real farmer being made Secretary of Agriculture. In the second place, you've got to have somebody to govern, and if you'll just allow me to be the Sovereign People I'll be mighty well satisfied."

"DE GOAT'S DONE ETT UP ALL DAT MONEY!"

It was an inspiration! Visions of coming campaigns, of urgent and impassioned appeals to the agricultural vote, and of close and exciting election returns filled the minds of every office-holder there. The motion to make the gentleman from Minnesota a member of the Cabinet was not even seconded.

III

"I SUPPOSE you've made a fair division of labor," remarked Silas as they sat down to the evening meal which had been skillfully prepared by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

"Labor!" ejaculated the chorus of brokers.

"The Sergeant-at-Arms," said the Secretary of the Interior with impressive dignity, "is the only man on the island officially entitled to work." He waved his hand with a flourish toward that official, who beamed with pleasure until all his teeth could be counted.

"Except the Sovereign People," suggested Silas, as he appropriated a turkey leg. "The Sovereign People is always entitled to work."

"There's no real need for you to farm, though," observed the chairman of the Committee on Food Supply, who was also Secretary of the Navy. "The natural food supply here can never give out."

"That's all right," replied Silas, "but I've got a sample package of prime Minnesota wheat that I was taking to my nephew in the Philippines, and I calculate to sow it and see what it does in this climate."

The Secretary of the Interior nearly choked on a wishbone in his haste.

"I bid sixty-two for one thousand bushels of September wheat!" he cried.

"Taken!" shouted eight excited brokers in unison.

"But look here," protested Silas, "I don't intend to put in more than an acre of wheat. The whole crop can't be more than about fifty bushels."

"It's a fact, though, that you intend to raise some wheat, isn't it?" asked the President anxiously.

"Yes," admitted Silas.

"Well, that's all right, then. You attend to the visible supply and we'll have the Sergeant-at-Arms begin the erection of a Board of Trade shed to-morrow."

Before the citizens of the new republic had retired to their beds of fragrant boughs that night nearly fifty thousand bushels of wheat had been sold for September delivery.

IV

BRIGHT and early the next morning Silas Gregg arose, pulled his breakfast off a tree and went out to his clearing. This show of energy on the part of the agricultural population influenced curbstone trading to a certain extent that morning, lowering September wheat two points by reason of the probability of a full crop. The prospects of the community seemed so bright, indeed, that a Cabinet meeting was called immediately after breakfast for the purpose of passing resolutions.

"Gentlemen," said the President in his eloquent address, "the Republic of Chicago Island is fairly launched and is entering upon an unexampled era of prosperity, due to that wise and efficient management displayed by the capable citizens who hold the reins of government." (Great applause.) "Honorable men, actuated only by the most noble of sentiments, have sacrificed their private inclination for the common weal and have been elected to their high offices absolutely without a hint or suspicion of bribery or corruption. Owing to the excellent policy that has been inaugurated, no member of this glorious commonwealth need suffer one moment for any of the creature comforts of life.

"Our agricultural interests are in a flourishing condition; the Sovereign People is happy and content under the prevailing administration; an abundant food supply has been provided by an all-wise Providence, which is unquestionably in sympathy with the political party now happily in power, and the government is supplying, free of all charge, to every citizen of this home of freedom, a climate unequaled under the sun!" (Loud and continued applause.) "Our commerce is in a condition so healthy and so active that no review of its achievements is necessary. It is equally needless to point out that this enviable state of affairs is directly traceable to a conservative but energetic Board of Trade!" (Wild applause.)

"Gentlemen, patriots and fellow-citizens of the Republic of Chicago Island . . ."

Here the President launched into a glowing peroration in which he mentioned the Constitution, the glorious flag, the martyrdom of Abraham Lincoln, the principal battles of the world and the equal rights of man; he marshaled forth a bewildering and glittering array of metaphor and panoplied it with the most impassioned eloquence; he plead, he argued, he cajoled; his voice rang with determination, it vibrated with enthusiasm, it thrilled with earnestness and it became hoarse with emotion. At the end of three-quarters of an hour the President sat down, covered with glory and dripping with perspiration.

It was a magnificent effort! After wearing themselves out with applause the little colony of ex-Americans heaved a mighty sigh of content. A rousing speech had been the only thing needed to make them thoroughly at home. They had a genuine "spellbinder" among them, that most wonderful and indispensable product of the Land of the Free and Home of the Brave, where no undertaking, large or small, is ever planned or executed without the aid of oratory.

V

BUT the crowning stroke was still to come. When order had been restored the Secretary of the Treasury came forward with a Utopian project which was designed to make of the new republic a model for all the progressive governments of the world. This plan was nothing less than an equal division of all the money on the island! Receipts were to be given each man for the amount he turned into the common fund, and this amount was to be restored in case they left the island within one year. Actual currency, only, was to be turned into this fund, letters of credit, drafts, checks, and all forms of foreign exchange being accounted as of no value. The plan was adopted with a whirl, and a sum amounting to $1749 was placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

While this money was being counted and receipted the Secretary of the Interior made another suggestion which met with instant favor—that, before the Board of Trade convened, they adjourn in a body to the agricultural district, in order to start trading with equal opportunities for judgment. The Secretary of the Treasury found that $1749 in bills of average small denomination made a very awkward bundle, so he left them in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms. As there was no one on the island to steal them, the latter official placed the greenbacks in the hollow of a tree for safety, while he worked at the sheds which were to be erected.

A half-hour's search landed the Board of Trade on the edge of Silas Gregg's farm, and the members seated themselves comfortably in the low, gnarled branches of the surrounding trees. Silas was busy clearing his acre of ground of weeds. Whenever he pulled up a handful of the matted vegetation and shook it, the rich black loam was scattered in every direction, and, in view of this condition of the soil, a strong bear interest was developed, September wheat being steadily beaten down to forty-seven, with but few takers.

"I AM A RUINED MAN!"

VI

IT WAS nearing noon when the Sergeant-at-Arms crashed into the clearing, his face ashen and consternation written on every line of his features.

"Foh de Lawd's sake," he gasped, "de goat's done et up all dat money!"

The government was bankrupt!

It was a terrible moment, but, in the face of overwhelming disaster, the Secretary of the Treasury proved his fitness for his office.

"Gentlemen," said he calmly, "it would only be folly for us to open that goat with the hope of recovering our greenbacks. We should find them macerated beyond all recognition. You note that I have not called those greenbacks money. We do not need the actual banknotes. We must remember that money is only an artificial medium of exchange. Gentlemen, the monetary wealth of this island is merely inclosed within that goat, which has become our repository—our treasury vault, so to speak. We will make use of the animal in its new capacity; not as a medium of exchange, it being, as a live goat, indivisible, but as the basis of our currency system. This afternoon, with the consent of the Government, I will issue scrip, calling for fractional parts of the government goat to the amount of $1749."

Genius itself inspired that idea! By this masterstroke the Republic was saved and no one was the loser, with the exception of the goat. When it became, in a sense, collateral security, it had to be tied up and thus lost its liberty.

And this is but a sample of the wisdom with which Chicago Island was governed. With such brilliant minds at its helm the ship of state sailed majestically on and the colony flourished beyond all expectation. Within two weeks comfortable sleeping-quarters had been erected, a Board of Trade shed completed, a dining-hall built and an evening assembly-room put under way.

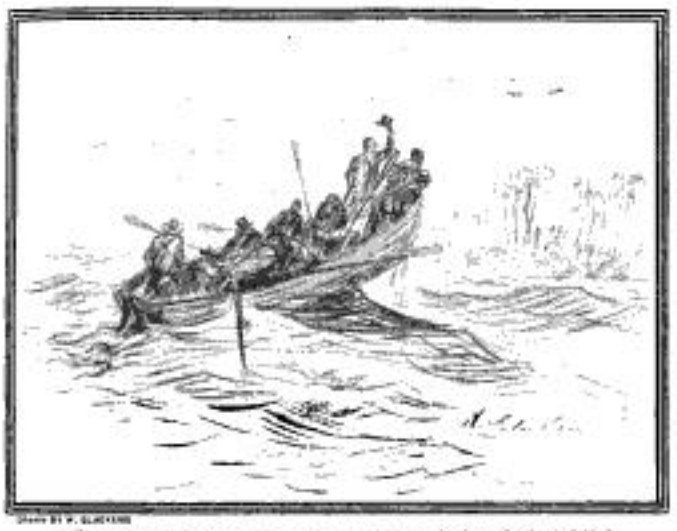
SILAS Gregg's wheat peeped through the soil in an incredibly short space of time and the operations in the wheat pit, up to this time a mere matter of daily routine, at once nearly doubled in volume. Daily trips were made to the wheat belt and every minute indication was carefully watched. For example: a corner of the field was unduly shaded. The effect of this was instantly foreseen by the Secretary of War, and he bought heavily at the prevailing prices, knowing that the growth in this corner would be stunted, so affecting the total yield and forcing higher prices. The Secretary of State noticed that a small strip of the field was seemingly fed by a tiny underground stream and he sold right and left, perceiving that this strip would bring up the average of the crop and so lower prices.

Silas Gregg was an object of equal solicitude. He complained of a malarial indisposition one morning and did not go to work until noon. Wheat went up seven points that morning. At the midday meal Silas was very hungry and the quotations were down to normal by evening. He thrashed Thomas Jefferson Jackson one day for walking across his field and the market prices were depressed, a man of his strenuous nature being certain to raise an abundant crop. If he whistled or sang or joked wheat went down. If he looked glum or blue or cross wheat went up. Indeed, it would have been almost possible to conduct the entire business of the Board of Trade with quotations on Silas Gregg, only naming him Wheat for convenience.

VIII

A NAPOLEON of commerce was bound to arise in all this buying and selling, and the Secretary of the Navy proved to be the man. One morning, before the opening of the stock exchange, he went privately to Silas Gregg and the Sergeant-at-Arms and borrowed all their scrip. When business opened he jumped into the wheat pit and began selling September wheat wherever he could find a buyer. His action was a complete surprise, as only the day before he had been looked upon as a persistent bull. Now, however, he was the leader of the bears. Down, down, down he forced the price and still he sold. By the close of the day he had disposed of a staggering quantity of wheat for September delivery and the bulls were wild with perplexity. That night the Secretary of the Navy was besieged by eight brokers, singly, in pairs and collectively, but he merely looked wise and kept his own counsel. The next morning, however, he detained Silas Gregg until the opening of the exchange and brought him on the floor. The two were instantly the centre of an eager group.

"Silas," said the Secretary of the Navy, pulling something from his pocket, "what is this?"



"Why, it's oats!" exclaimed Silas, after a delighted examination of the specimen. He was as pleased as if he had just met an old and cherished friend. The stalk was passed around for inspection. It was undeniably oats! A light began to dawn upon the puzzled bulls.

"You've rather got us," admitted the President, "but, while an abundance of this cereal is bound to affect the quotations on wheat to a certain extent, I cannot see where it will account for the wide difference made by your manipulations of yesterday. As a matter of fact, old man, I rather think you overdid it."

"I'd like to sell fifty thousand more," answered the Secretary of the Navy, as he smilingly recovered the sample and once more passed it to Silas. "What peculiarity do you notice about that stalk of oats?" he asked of the man from Minnesota.

Silas studied it for a moment in perplexity and then suddenly brightened up.

—CAME SAFELY TO LAND IN THE LEAKY OLD LONG BOAT THE SAILORS WOULD NOT TRUST

"Well," he said, "it's got about twice as many grains on it as any stalk of oats I ever saw."

"Exactly!" cried the Secretary of the Navy. "I found this stuff growing wild, and every stalk like this. Everything on the island bears in equal proportion, and when our wheat ripens——"

"I offer five thousand September at thirty-one!" shrieked the Vice-President.

Instantly a scene of the wildest pandemonium ensued. The bulls were panic-stricken and the bears gloated over them. The former frantically tried to rush to cover but the attempt was useless. Wheat slumped ten points in as many minutes. The Secretary of the Navy, by concealing his find for one day, had made a fortune at the expense of an over-confident bull market and he was correspondingly elated.

IX

SILAS GREGG was spellbound. He had been in the monkey-house at the Zoo just before feeding-time, but he had never witnessed a scene approaching this. By and by he moved to get a better view. His foot slipped on a banana peel. He came down with his full weight upon his arm and lay groaning with pain.

He had sprained his wrist.

They all rushed to pick him up. The President caught him by the shoulders and had his head raised from the floor when an idea struck him and he dropped the head with a thump. He foresaw the effect of this sprain on the wheat crop!

"I bid twenty-seven for five thousand September wheat!" he shrieked.

The effect was electrical. Within a dozen seconds only Thomas Jefferson Jackson was left to minister to Silas Gregg and the Secretary of the Navy was trying in vain to beat back the bull avalanche. In flying leaps of two and three points wheat had regained all that it had lost, and was still climbing upward toward the highest point that had yet been reached when the Secretary of the Navy, beaten and crushed, drew out of the maelstrom and crossed over to where Silas Gregg reclined with his eyes half-closed.

White to the lips the vanquished speculator bent over to examine the injured member. It was already swelling and gave Silas intense agony.

"There is no question but that his wrist is badly sprained," he said, in a voice that trembled slightly in spite of all his efforts at repression. "This accident has wrecked me! Every dollar I had in the world and all I could borrow was staked on this deal! I am a ruined man! Ruined! Disgraced! Dishonored!"

With a half-articulate cry he suddenly dashed out of the shed and disappeared in the woods. For two weeks he was missing, but, except at meal-times, it can scarcely be said that he was missed, for the business of buying and selling ungrown wheat is an absorbing occupation and leaves no room for minor considerations, such as life and death and disappearances.

His disastrous effort to corner the market made prominent, however, one radical defect in the commercial system of the island.

There were no lambs!

It was maddening to think that in all this colony of ex-Americans there was not one representative of the largest and most useful class of people in the United States. And it could not be remedied. None of the brokers would resign to occupy this important position, Silas Gregg obstinately refused to have anything to do with it, and Thomas Jefferson Jackson had no scrip left. They were forced, contrary to all their principles, to prey upon each other only. It seemed a shame, but they had to put up with it.

X

ONE morning, during a lull in the trading, a strange figure appeared in the wheat pit. It was the missing Secretary of the Navy, clad in a complete waterproof suit of dried grasses.

"Great idea!" he explained. "Saves your only suit for use in case a ship ever stops here and you decide to go back to the States. I've got an outfit here for each one of you. Twenty dollars apiece, if you want them."

Within half an hour one hundred and twenty dollars in scrip on the Government goat reposed in his pocket. Then he hunted up Silas Gregg, whose wrist was entirely recovered, to get an extension of time on his debt to that gentleman.

"I can't figure out where you owe me anything," said Silas, scratching his head. "Of course I like to have anything that's coming to me, and I'm mighty glad to have this suit, on account, as you put it. And if you owe me a hundred-odd dollars' worth of that goat you may pay it any time you get ready. So far as I'm concerned, though, they may cut off my share of the goat and cook it for supper. I've got my letter of credit on a Manila bank in my pocket now. All the money I had when I landed on the island was forty-five cents and I've got that yet. So don't worry yourself about the goat money. I don't see any good of it, anyhow."

Thomas Jefferson Jackson was not so complaisant. He was very severe in his greeting to the man who had borrowed and lost all his capital, and he had a vast amount of righteous indignation bottled up, ready for explosion the moment the prodigal speculator began to apologize or show any other signs of weakness. When, however, the Secretary of the Navy handed him a dried-grass suit of brown, with red stripes running through it, and a Sergeant-at-Arms suit of gray, with blue epaulettes and blue stripes on sleeves and trouser legs, Mr. Jackson was not only mollified but was delighted to accept this gay garb at a valuation of sixty dollars, and to make a generous extension of time on the balance of the debt.

XI

THE Secretary of the Navy resumed his place on the Board of Trade the next morning and began buying in a mild way. He had taken his place among the bulls again, and if he had any new plans for cornering the market he had learned a lesson of caution, for it was not till after three days had passed that it was found he had quietly invested every cent he had in very narrow margins on September wheat, buying a little here and a little there without exciting suspicion.

On the fourth day he called a meeting of the Cabinet on a matter of grave importance.

"I feel it my duty," he began, "not to the Board of Trade, but to the Republic of Chicago Island, to call your attention to the necessity of having a Secretary of Agriculture. A condition has come to my notice that could not, unreported, have existed had we elected so important an official."

Some uneasiness was apparent among the members of the Cabinet, particularly on the part of those who represented the bear interest on the Board of Trade, but he was not interrupted.

"As a private individual," he went on, "I have discovered that the entire wheat crop of the country is threatened by an insect which is already destroying the roots of the plants at the eastern edge of——"

The Secretary of the Navy did not finish his speech, for there was no one left to listen to him. With a supreme disregard for parliamentary usage, the entire body had adjourned informally, and had started at a gallop for Silas Gregg's wheat patch! The Secretary of the Navy, wearing a broad grin, followed them more at his leisure.

—CLOSELY PURSUED BY THE INFURIATED SILAS GREGG

XII

SILAS was found at the eastern edge of the "wheat belt" busily uprooting row after row of the tender young plants and heaping them in a huge pile to burn.

"Will you be able to save any of this crop?" breathlessly asked the President.

"Well," answered Silas, stopping to stroke his whiskers and make a leisurely survey of the field and the sky, "I reckon I'll save at least half of it; maybe a little more."

"How long have you known of this?"

"Oh, about three or four days, I guess."

"And why didn't you announce the fact to us?" The President's voice was very stern and his dilating nostrils betrayed signs of anger.

"I didn't see where it was anybody's business, in particular, except mine, and, to tell you the truth, I was too busy trying to figure out a way to save the crop without too much waste," answered Silas.

"Without too much waste of profits!" broke in the Vice-President, who was heavily on the short side of wheat. "Do you mean to deny that you suppressed this information until the Secretary of the Navy could cover the entire market? You're in league with him to——"

"Looky here!" exclaimed Silas, grabbing up a stake and, with his pale blue eyes snapping, advancing before the assembled Republic of Chicago Island. "I don't quite understand you fellows. If I'm lucky I expect to harvest about thirty-five or maybe forty bushels of wheat off this land, and I judge that you've already sold about a million bushels of it. Now I don't care what you do in that line, but I'll say this much: the next man that hints about me being mixed up in anything underhanded will get his head knocked off! Now skedaddle!"

There was no use in trying to make Silas Gregg understand commerce, so they left.

XIII

THE Board of Trade was convened in a hurry immediately on the return of the brokers to the town of New Chicago. On the way wheat had jumped up twenty points in "curbstone trading," made by brokers on the run, and now it speedily sprang to a dollar a bushel, carrying the fortunes of the calmly satisfied Secretary of the Navy along with it to the top notch of affluence.

Time after time the bears stubbornly rallied, but their efforts to break or to hold down the price were of no avail. The second day after this they were still attempting, in a feeble sort of a way, to save something from the wreck, and the Secretary of the Navy was lolling on the railing of the wheat pit, enjoying the situation, when a series of loud bleats interrupted the proceedings. The members hastily assembled in front of the shed in time to see the goat dart past, closely pursued by the infuriated Silas Gregg. In response to their shouts Silas halted long enough to explain.

"Why, that darn goat," he gasped, "broke loose and got into my patch last night, and ate up every last leaf of my wheat!"

Then he dashed on, leaving the Board of Trade stunned.

No wheat! They were all ruined! The entire commerce of Chicago Island had crumbled into dust—was destroyed at one

HIT A RESOUNDING THWACK

A Citizen of No Ideals

"I WAS in one of the mountain villages of Kentucky on county court day," said Senator McCreary of that State.

"The countrymen for miles around had come in to trade and talk politics. As I was standing in the public square a thrifty-looking young fellow rode by on horseback. He had a bolt of calico and a side of bacon lying across the pommel of his saddle.

"'There goes Bill Jones with caliker an' hog meat,' said one of the natives contemptuously. 'He don't think of nothin' but eatin' an' clothes. I'll bet he ain't got airy bottle of whisky, squirrel rifle or coon dog out to his house.'"

Out of the Mouths of Babes

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL NELSON A. MILES is a golfer. Clad in his knickerbockers, his plaid stockings and his crimson coat he makes a gallant figure on the links of the Chevy Chase Club at Washington.

A day or two ago the General had a critical young person for a caddy. The General topped his drive off the fourth tee. The ball joggled along a few yards and then rolled into a depression. It was "cupped," as the golfers say.

There was nothing for it but a try with the lofter. General Miles spat on his hands, measured his distance carefully, tried to keep his eye on the ball and swung mightily. He hit the District of Columbia a resounding thwack. The ball did not move. He tried again and again and with the same results. The fourth prodigious effort moved the ball a few feet.

"See here, old chap," said the caddy, who was much bored by the exhibition, "you'll have to do better than that!"

A Narrow Escape for "Old Prob"

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, of the United States Supreme Court, is one of the most persistent golfers at the National Capital. At dinner a few nights ago he was bemoaning the rainy weather that kept him from the links to a young man whose interest in appearing sympathetic with the woes of the great jurist was as great as his ignorance of the game.

"I have often thought," said the young man, "that these continued spells of rain must make you golfers feel like going up to the Weather Bureau and beating Mr. Moore about the head with a stymie."

Tardy Advice for the President

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT does not see one-quarter of the letters written to him, but he did see one a few days ago that gave him much amusement.

A member of the Union League Club in New York—the President says it would not be fair to tell his name—wrote in great haste to inform him that while coming from Europe to this country he met on the ship a German traveler. The German told the Union Leaguer that there is a great lake in the interior of Nicaragua, 103 miles long and 45 miles wide. The Union League man thought the President should know of this, inasmuch as there was some talk of digging an interoceanic canal in that part of the hemisphere. He thought the story of the German was well worth investigating as he seemed to be a truthful person.

The President thanked the writer for the information, but said the existence of the lake was known to some few people, as Gil Gonzales happened on it one January day in 1522.

The Odds Were Too Heavy

"PRIVATE" JOHN ALLEN, of Tupelo, Mississippi, now a United States Commissioner for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, was a valiant soldier in the Confederate Army.

"JOHN, LET'S QUIT"

He tells a story of a neighbor of his who enlisted with him. They became separated from their regiment during their first battle and sat down on a rail fence to talk it over.

A shell from a Yankee gun came screaming along while they were talking, and burst about a hundred yards from them.

"John," said the neighbor, "let's quit and go home. It ain't no use. We never can lick folks like them. There was enough in that shell to kill forty men, and they fired it at just you and me!"

A Sign of the Times

THE sure sign that a politician is the real boss of his State or city or ward is when his followers begin to call him "The Old Man." That is the highest term of endearment and loyalty.

Senator Platt is "The Old Man" to all New York State wheel-horse Republicans, as Senator Quay is to his people in Pennsylvania. Not a few Senators and Representatives speak of President Roosevelt as "The Old Man," although he is but forty-four. That means a great deal to the students of contemporaneous politics.

Still Loyal to the Lost Cause

THERE are several men on the Democratic side of the United States Senate who were officers in the Confederate Army.

Senator Bate, of Tennessee, was a major-general under the Stars and Bars. He is a powerful man and a good citizen, but he has never forgotten the Lost Cause.

"Clay," he said one day to the Senator from Georgia after a vote just before the close of the last session of Congress, "why on earth did you vote that way?"

Clay looked up in surprise. "My dear Senator Bate," he said, "I think my vote was right."

"Perhaps," sighed Senator Bate, "perhaps, but it was totally opposed to all Confederate principles."

The Office-Seeker's Philosophy

THE philosophy of the office-seeker is never understood, even in Washington, which is the headquarters of the clan.

On the morning after the first authentic news of the Martinique disaster was printed President Roosevelt received a letter from a man in Philadelphia. He wrote he had read in the papers that the American consul at Martinique had been killed and he applied for the place.

HE APPLIED FOR THE PLACE

He said he was eminently fitted for the position, was a life-long Republican, cited instances of his party fealty, expressed his warm admiration for the President, and concluded with this declaration: "I hasten to make this earnest application for the place in order that I may get in ahead of those loathsome and disgusting products of our political system, the office-seekers."

The Democratic Secretary of Commerce

THERE is a little lunch-room on Fifteenth Street in Washington where the hungry man goes in, helps himself to whatever he fancies, sits down in a big chair with wide arms, eats his food and then pays the cashier. There are no waiters. The menu is simple. There are three or four kinds of sandwiches, half a dozen kinds of pie, Maryland biscuits, crullers, cakes, tea and coffee.

Every afternoon, between two and three, a quiet, dignified man walks in, takes a sandwich, a piece of pie and gets a mug of coffee. He sits down and eats his luncheon in the most inconspicuous corner, pays his fifteen or twenty cents and leaves.

That man is the Honorable George B. Cortelyou, Secretary of the newly-created Department of Commerce and Labor. When he was a $2000 stenographer at the White House he began going to this lunch-room, and now that he is a Cabinet Minister he remains true to the old place. High position has not changed Cortelyou. He is the most democratic, the most genial and the most approachable of men, and he does not believe in putting on frills because he is one of the President's official family.

How to Make Quay Mad

SENATOR MATTHEW STANLEY QUAY, of Pennsylvania, has been denounced in many newspapers for many years as the master manipulator of his time. The Senator has smiled at the attacks and continued imperturbably on his way.

The editorial thunderer who thinks to worry or chagrin or humiliate Senator Quay by charging him with high political crimes and misdemeanors would better save his space for other purposes. He cannot do it.

Yet when the humble political reporter, scenting deals and combinations, says Senator Quay "held a political conference on Sunday" he does more than any editorial writer ever did. That charge is the pet aversion of the Senator. He says he never does and never did hold political conferences on Sunday, and such a statement makes him furiously angry.

The Man-Eating Editor

DURING the last years of the life of W. F. Story, the famous editor of the old Chicago Times, he was irritable and nervous. Each morning when he arrived at the office he thought it his duty to discharge somebody. That done, he would go to luncheon and forget all about it.

"DISCHARGE HIM!"

The staff of the Times held many conferences. Clearly, it was incumbent on them to appease in some way the appetite of Mr. Story for sudden removals.

Some genius suggested that they feed their employer's wrath with elevator boys. They collected a large assortment of inexperienced lads. Each morning one was put in charge of the elevator. When Mr. Story came in the awkward boy would jolt him, stop at the wrong floor and commit all sorts of elevator sins.

"Who's that idiot running the elevator?" Story roared, morning after morning, when he finally reached his office.

"So-and-so," an editor replied.

"Discharge him!" commanded Story.

That saved some member of the staff and satisfied Mr. Story, although it was rather rough on the boys.

The Uses of Adversity

FRANK A. VANDERLIP, now one of the vice-presidents of the National City Bank of New York, the great Rockefeller stronghold, was financial editor of the Chicago Tribune in 1892 and 1893—a hardworking newspaper man, dependent on his salary.

Those were panic times. Banks were failing every day. Joseph Medill, the editor of the Tribune, was in Southern California. He was much exercised over the situation and was in close touch with the office, constantly advising conservatism and optimism in the newspaper reports.

Vanderlip, by close economy and some minor investments, had saved $800. It was all he had. One day the bank failed in which he had deposited his little nest egg. He went despondently to his desk. The world looked black to him. It was a hard blow.

A messenger boy came in with a telegram. Vanderlip signed for it mechanically—his thoughts were on his lost $800. He tore open the envelope. The telegram was from Mr. Medill. It read: "Take a cheerful view of the situation."

A Definition of Senatorial Frivolity

"GEORGE," said the gray-headed Senator McEnery, of Louisiana, to a friend—"George, you are too frivolous."

"Why, Senator," protested the young man, "I'm not frivolous. I am really very solemn."

"No, you're not," persisted the Senator. "You are frivolous. Don't be frivolous. It will ruin you. George," he continued earnestly, "I know what I am talking about. Frivolity ruined my career."

"Pshaw, Senator, I don't think your life has been ruined much. You have twice been Governor of your State, have been a justice of the Louisiana Supreme Court, have accumulated a fortune, and now you are in the United States Senate and can stay there as long as you wish."

"I know, George," said the Senator, laying his hand on his friend's shoulder, "I know about all those things. What do they amount to? Why, George, if I hadn't been so frivolous I might have been commanding-general of the Second Louisiana Brigade forty years ago."

"GEORGE, YOU ARE TOO FRIVOLOUS"

A Model Charter for a Small City

By Thomas G. Hayes

Mayor of Baltimore

Author of A City Without Graft

AN EMINENT Englishman who had traveled extensively in this country, and who had studied our institutions practically as well as theoretically, said to me at a dinner recently:

"I can very well understand the value of your system which divides the functions of political government into the three great divisions — legislative, executive and judicial. In many respects it is ideal. I can see how it works well with the nation and with the state, which have the problems of political conditions and policies, but it is beyond my comprehension that you should feel obliged to apply such a system to running a municipality. That is so plainly a business proposition that to my mind the political scheme can have no real relation to it or to the problems which are involved in it. Why should you have three divisions in a matter which is so purely a business undertaking? It all seems to me a contradiction of the common-sense which is such a strong factor in your American methods."

My reply to him was: "There are many Americans who think as you do, and at times I have been inclined to agree with them, but the more I have studied public sentiment, which, after all, regulates government in this country, and have become acquainted with the real municipal conditions, the more I have found that the legislative and executive functions are really necessary even in municipal government. In the first place, our people are trained in that habit; they cannot separate themselves and their thoughts from it; there must be the feeling that they, through their legislators and executives, are the powers that rule, and they believe their affairs are safer when they place one function as a check upon the other. We have been slow in good municipal government mainly because we have given to the legislative function too much license, and have not placed upon the executive function that direct and unavoidable responsibility which it should have. You will observe that we are getting our common-sense to work and are doing better, and I believe that in the course of time the American method will produce larger and more economical results than the plan which you have in your country, and which is held up to us as a model."

I said nothing about the judicial function because that in some cities is provided for under the State Government, and has no special municipal existence. But we must deal with the legislative and executive: those are the two powers which must be harnessed to pull our cities to better progress, larger economy and fairer conditions. Letters have come to me by the hundreds from all parts of the world since the appearance of the last article, A City Without Graft, in this magazine, and in them two facts are very prominent. The first is the desire of good citizens to improve the city government which they have, and the other is the seeking on the part of the small and growing cities of charters that will enable them to start right and thus to avoid most of the evils that result from bad systems. It is for these that the present article is intended.

The Chief Weakness of City Government

FIRST of all, the chief danger and weakness of American municipal government is the city council, or the board of aldermen, or whatever name the municipal legislature may be called. The plan of electing representatives of wards, or precincts, or sections of a city is vicious. It brings together a lot of men whose political existence depends upon how much they can get for their respective localities. They lose sight of the greater good of the whole community and invariably there is a scramble for spoils and appropriations, for everything from lamplighters to asphalted streets and public buildings. There have been exceptions — and really splendid exceptions, too — to this rule, but in almost every case the men who sought to legislate for the whole city, irrespective of special localities, met either ridicule or quiet contempt. In the system of trading votes and working for favors their influence counted nothing. I need not dwell upon the notorious instances of bribery and corruption, of the giving away of franchises and the riots of extravagance. I prefer to take the city legislature at its best, and at its best it is bad. I say this without intending to reflect upon the exceptional men — and there are many of them — who are members of city councils, for a bad system would defeat the good intentions of angels themselves.

Therefore, in the model charter for the small city I should eliminate the city council as we know it, and I should substitute for it a board, say of five men, to be elected by the people at the same time that the mayor was elected. This election should be on a different day and at a different season from that of the state or national election so as to separate the municipal contest as absolutely as possible from political and partisan campaigns. These men should be chosen irrespective of locality so far as the provisions of the charter could control. Each man should, for two years preceding his election, have paid taxes on at least $2000 worth of freehold property. I should like to make it $5000. I say freehold particularly because it is tangible. Personal property has that elusiveness which makes it generally unsatisfactory in this connection. Under our system of taxation the maximum burden falls upon real estate. Therefore the man who pays taxes on freehold has that direct knowledge and interest valuable in the running of a city's affairs. He is apt to do better service because the fact is constantly before his mind that he must pay his part of the cost.

Pay City Officers Good Salaries

THE five men whom I have mentioned should be well paid for their services. A salary of $1000 or $2000 a year would not be too much. I am strongly opposed to unpaid municipal officers of any kind, however good and self-sacrificing they may be. The plan does not work well. As a rule men "average up." If they work without salary they naturally expect compensation in some direction, although they may scorn anything that seems wrong or illegitimate. Then, too, unpaid servants cannot be held to accountability as can those who receive a good salary for their work.

This board should be surrounded by rigid conditions and held close to its rules. In order to prevent hasty legislation the charter should provide that no measure could pass without a delay of at least three days. The board should have no power to override the veto of the mayor, and it should have the appointment of no officers except those necessary for its own operation.

Next, the mayor. He should be over twenty-five years of age, five years a resident of the city, assessed with freehold property to the amount of from $2000 to $5000; his term should be four years; his salary should be from $2000 to $5000, according to the size of the city; he should have the power of veto absolutely; he should have the appointment of the heads of all departments and the approval or disapproval of all appointments made in the departments.

The separation between the legislature of five and the mayor should be so complete that the mayor could have no excuse for shifting the blame for his own sins or derelictions upon others. All his appointments should be registered voters of the city except, of course, females. The purpose of the charter should be to fix upon the mayor rigidly the responsibility for the administration of the city's affairs, whether through his own acts or the acts of his appointees. The fact should never be lost sight of that he himself must be accountable for any extravagance or error of administration.

Next should be a board of awards consisting of (1) the mayor, (2) the head of the department of public safety, which should include the fire department and the police department, (3) the commissioner of health, (4) the city engineer or the chief of the department of public improvements, under which should come the water board, the harbor board, the inspector of buildings and the general city work, and (5) the head of the public school system. This board of awards should have the supervision of all the actual business of the city administration. It should advertise for bids on all city supplies and make its awards to the lowest responsible bidders.

That is to say, no department should have the power to purchase its own supplies. The whole matter should come under the board of awards excepting, of course, small items which may be needed in department emergencies.

What the Board of Awards Will Do

THIS board will do three things: it will place a check upon the expenditure of money; it will keep the expenses and appropriations of the city government within its means, and it will get for the city terms as advantageous as those which would be given to any other corporation or business concern.

It will be seen that this arrangement provides an accountability that reaches through every department to the head of the city, and that precludes the probability of jobbery or extravagance.

The successful bidder on any city contract should be compelled to execute a formal contract satisfactory to the board and also furnish a bond, to be approved by the mayor, for double the amount of the contract price. To all bids should be attached certified checks of the bidders as forfeitures if they fail to comply with the terms of their agreements.

It may seem a bold statement, but it cannot be contradicted, that the cities in this country have given away public franchises which if sold to-day at their value would wipe out all the municipal indebtedness. The older cities have paid dearly for the experience, and the younger cities, which in the near future will have many times the population they now possess, can profit from the lesson. Therefore the grant of franchises, or rights in the streets, or other public property should not be for a period of more than twenty-five years, and should be sold under the supervision of the board of awards, with the ironclad condition that the city shall not divest itself of the right or power to regulate the exercise of the franchise or right granted.

This is important, and I may explain it better. Suppose street-car companies want a certain franchise. First they would have to secure the necessary legislation from the board of five. Next, the mayor would have to sign the ordinance. Third, the board of awards would advertise the franchise in the daily papers, reserving an upset price and fixing the various conditions. Then after the sale was made to the highest responsible bidder, bond would be required fully to protect the city. The city shall have the option at the end of twenty-five years either to take and operate the property on its own account, provided the city pays, exclusive of the franchise, the cost of the plant; or to renew the grant for a period not exceeding twenty-five years on a revaluation, or to sell the same to the highest bidder at public sale. If necessary, it can operate the plant and property on its own account for five years, after which it may determine either to continue the operation or to lease the property.

By protecting the purchases and expenditures of a city and retaining power over public franchises the city government escapes most of the old evils and becomes almost powerless to perpetrate any extensive fraud upon the taxpayers. The charter holds its officials with chains of iron.

In these days when the bonding business has been so well developed there is no difficulty whatever in fully providing for the financial responsibility of our city officials. I believe they should be bonded thoroughly. This also protects the care of city moneys and makes defalcations practically impossible. In the past, when city officials have stolen large sums, their bondsmen have often escaped payment through technicalities or through the action of the city councils. Under the new conditions it could not happen.

I believe implicitly in the value of publicity. If citizens have difficulty in getting a look at the finances of their municipalities it is a very sure sign that something is wrong. The books should always be open. There is no reason why the statement of the city's moneys should not be made as regularly as the statement of a bank or any business corporation.

I have said nothing here about minority representation, but I am a firm believer in the wisdom of it. It is a useful check, and it helps the public confidence. The great thing, however, is to get the right sort of men in office under rigid conditions, to pay them well for their services, and to exact from them the highest service. Public officials should be as regular in their hours and as attentive to their duties as any other class of men who receive salaries.

One department that should be unqualifiedly removed from partisanship is the public school system. Perhaps it is one exception in which leading citizens may be asked to serve as commissioners without remuneration, but I believe even in that it is best they should be paid. The main point is to get for superintendent of this system a progressive, energetic and up-to-date person—preferably a young man—and to pay him a first-rate salary for his work, and to leave him untrammeled. To secure such a superintendent there should be no restrictions or prohibitions as to residence or property qualifications. Get the best man even though you have to import him from the Philippines. Our experience in Baltimore illustrates the wisdom of this. We secured our superintendent from Denver, Colorado, against the loud protest of local prejudice, but so admirable have been his results that he has received offers of greater salaries to go to other cities, and we are holding on to him only by his interest in the work and by the hope of the rewards which we expect to give him. If you get your public schools in the right hands you will uplift the whole community, secure larger and better schoolhouses, increase the value of the rising generation, and put into the homes that finer stimulus which comes so potently through the interest of young folks.

I am aware that this broad sketch of a model charter contains radical innovations, but I know that they represent the best experience and enlightenment upon the subject. So effective is the improvement of city government and so complete its results that if you go to the meeting of the representatives of American municipalities you can, without knowing the names of the men or of the cities, select those delegates from the places which are making the greatest and best progress in the United States—it simply shines out. The cities which are doing things, which are reaching new standards and larger development are those which are purifying and strengthening their city governments.

Outside of the mere facts of handling the money honestly and of getting full value for franchises is the wonderful saving it signifies to the business life of the people. When you have bad government your citizens spend a large part of their time fretting over it, seeking new remedies and working themselves into ferments, which consume time and waste nervous energy. All this force is actually subtracted from the motive power of the population. The city with an honest and economical government has more time and more force for its business affairs. A bad government simply makes more difficult progress of any kind: it burdens not only the taxpayers but advancement itself. The smaller cities, therefore, have everything to gain by starting right, by avoiding the mistakes which have brought municipal government in America into such contempt. It can be done, and the first great step is to eliminate the city council as we now understand it, and at the same time to fix forever the system of direct responsibility upon the mayor.

Stage Managers' Woes

By Julian Mitchell

IN DECIDING on a light opera for performance one of three courses is followed: The piece may be one already written; again, it may be written "around" the singers—that is, the company is engaged before the composer or librettist had put pen to paper, and a special rôle must be prepared for each singer; or it may be written to order for the exploitation of a star, the supporting cast being subsequently chosen.

In the case of The Fortune Teller, which I staged for Miss Alice Neilson, the opera was written especially for the star by Mr. Harry B. Smith and Mr. Victor Herbert. They submitted the scenario to the manager with a list of solo voices required, and when these matters had been settled, and the principals engaged, came the selection of the chorus, always an important branch in light opera production. To secure these latter singers an agency is applied to or an advertisement inserted. They assemble at the theatre, where the musical director and stage manager form a jury of selection. The appearance they present is strangely different from the eventual one, for the day may be rainy, and dripping umbrellas and mackintoshes take the place of the glow and color of theatrical costumes that will later replace them. Seated at the piano, the musical director tests each voice by the singing of a scale or a song, and I take notes on personal appearance and ability in dancing. These points are entered in our books, and when the test is over we confer and make our choice accordingly. Thirty girls and from twenty to thirty men, the latter always a necessary evil in light opera, for they contribute little to the general attractiveness, are required. The men are selected mainly for their singing voices, although here, too, the matter of personal comeliness is an important one. The next morning they again assemble at the theatre, and from among the hundreds of applicants the fifty or sixty to be engaged are notified, while the remainder are told that the list is filled, a polite way of informing them that they will not do.

The musical director rehearses the chorus for a week before my labors as stage manager begin, but I make it a point always to be present in order to memorize the score and to get an idea of the tempo, pauses and possible effects for the action to be supplied. It takes a week for this preliminary study of each act, so that I begin on the first act with the chorus when the director has commenced on the second. With the music I have nothing to do, my sole charge being the action, and to get my ideas of it understood by the singers one number will very frequently have to be repeated twenty or thirty times.

Owing to the importance of the physical freshness of our vocalists, the musical director's rehearsals begin an hour or two before mine. Meanwhile, he is rehearsing the solo singers in another part of the same theatre, or at a different one.

As we progress our combined presence is required when music and action are first taken up together.

The principals are drilled separately in action, but I have found very few of them capable of inventing their business in numbers they sing with the chorus, and that it devolves upon the stage manager to invent it for them.

In these busy days the important matters of scenery and costumes have not been neglected. Every item of dress—boots, wigs and hats—is given to a different branch of stage furnishers. With the trying on comes a break in rehearsals, from ten to twenty singers being excused at a time for the necessary visits to costumers. When these things are finally completed comes one of the most tiring points of the whole preparation of a production—the dress review, when the entire costumes for each of the three acts are donned by every several individual, and passed upon as they pose for inspection on the stage. Sometimes every separate costume has to be made over, the fit, style or general ensemble not meeting full requirement, and tears and entreaties from the chorus girl, who is not oblivious to her appearance, make a part of the manager's burden. This great item of expense, the costuming, is generally met in its entirety for principals as well as chorus by the management, except in the case of gloves, boots, or some such item bought individually by soloists in the cast.

The last week before the production of the opera full-dress rehearsals with scenery, costumes and properties are held for three or four days. At these full rehearsals it may be found that the opera is too long; in that event, numbers have to be cut out that have required hours of study and preparation, but the inevitable must be met, the sole question being to meet it wisely by omitting that which can best be spared.

Five days before the first public performance the musical director and composer hold their rehearsals of the score alone with the orchestra, and immediately succeeding them singing rehearsals take place in which all action is omitted. Endurance is the thing at this point of preparation, and the different rehearsals beginning at ten o'clock in the morning end only at midnight, and then simply because of lack of human ability to respond to greater demand.

The Western Mortgage Lifter—By Philip Eastman

ALFALFA, THE PLANT THAT HAS REDEEMED THE WEST. IT YIELDS FOUR OR FIVE CROPS A YEAR IN THE DRYEST REGIONS

THREE-YEAR-OLD ALFALFA PLANT WITH ROOTS EIGHT FEET LONG

NEXT in importance to the divine profusion of water, light and air, those three great physical facts which render existence possible, may be reckoned the universal beneficence of grass," said Senator John J. Ingalls. Alfalfa, which came as an antidote for booms and drought in the Middle West, must be reckoned equally as lavish in beneficence as grass. It is the cornerstone upon which is being built the unfailing prosperity of the Western farmer. With its never-failing four and five crops a year; its tonnage greater than that of any other forage plant; its wonderful fattening qualities for cattle and swine; its value as a feed for bees and poultry; its perennity, covering a quarter of a century; its ability to withstand drought and hot winds because of its roots which bore down until they find water, it is the wonder of Western agriculture.

In the less productive regions of Western Kansas and Nebraska, Eastern Colorado, Wyoming and Arizona, land formerly thought to be suitable only for grazing has been given an agricultural value by reason of the large alfalfa yields. Already in many of the "short grass" counties of Western Kansas and Nebraska thousands of acres are being raised and fed to cattle, sheep and hogs with large profit. Many who have looked upon irrigation as the only means of putting such lands on a paying basis now say "alfalfa is the way out."

The rapid increase of alfalfa cultivation is probably unequaled by any other product of the soil. In less than half a century, and for the most part in the last decade, it has become a factor in agriculture and has been largely responsible for the upbuilding of the extensive dairy industry in the Middle West. In many localities the profits realized by turning alfalfa into beef and pork would read almost like the startling stories that came out of the Klondike a few years ago. Alfalfa butter is shipped to New York by the train-load; alfalfa-fed chickens and turkeys fill cars that go to Boston; the best chops on the breakfast-table of the Philadelphian are alfalfa-fed.

Nothing "New Fangled" About Alfalfa

AT FIRST farmers were disposed to look upon alfalfa as they had learned to look upon new-fangled "patent" windmills and lightning rods—a thing to be avoided. The general belief was that it was a new and untried product, but in reality it is older than the Christian era. It was grown in Greece as early as 450 B. C. Cincinnatus, the patrician farmer, may have been plowing for alfalfa, in his fields across the Tiber, when he was called upon to don his toga and become dictator. The horses of the Roman army were fed upon it and it is still cultivated in Italy. The Latin races at first had a monopoly on the cultivation of it. From Italy it was introduced into Spain, then Southern France. The Spaniards carried it to South America and to Mexico. It was grown in many of the Northern countries of Europe and was known in New York in 1820, but it did not gain a foothold in the United States until 1854, when it was introduced from Chili to California. Since then its march eastward across the country has been steady, until it is now grown, more or less extensively, in every State and Territory in the Union.

Alfalfa has been the text of agricultural revivals. It has been preached and taught at the Farmers' Grange meetings and at the agricultural colleges. Captain J. H. Churchill, of Dodge City, Kansas, was given the title of "The Alfalfa King" because of his untiring efforts in spreading the gospel of the new forage plant. He had been a sailor on the Atlantic seaboard and his experience as a farmer had been of a few years, yet he was one of the first to discover the adaptability of alfalfa to Kansas soil and to champion its cause among farmers with years of experience. He owns a ranch of 2000 acres and an extensive dairy, and his alfalfa-fed milch cows furnish the milk and cream used on a large part of the Santa Fe dining-car and eating-house system. When he was recently elected president of the Kansas State Board of Agriculture, in recognition of his services to the farming interests of his State, Kansas had nearly 400,000 acres of alfalfa, an increase of 350,000 acres in a dozen years.

Some Alfalfa Statistics

IT WAS not until the taking of the census in 1900 that the statisticians recognized alfalfa. This census gives the total acreage as 2,094,011 and the tonnage of the product as 5,522,671. The tonnage per acre for all the States ranged from 1.0 to 3.4, the lowest being in Rhode Island, where but two acres were raised, and the greatest being in Washington, where 35,166 acres were grown. The general average was 2.5 per acre.

The census gave Colorado first place with 455,237 acres, California second with 298,898 acres, Utah third with 268,229 acres, Kansas fourth with 267,378 acres, Idaho fifth with 160,029 acres, Nebraska sixth with 115,142 acres, Nevada seventh with 96,725 acres, Wyoming eighth with 74,688 acres, Montana ninth with 68,959 acres, and Arizona tenth with 62,585 acres. Since the compiling of the census the acreage has been greatly enlarged, and in 1903 it is safe to say that Kansas will have 400,000 acres. In Nebraska the acreage has been increased annually by 10,000 to 12,000 acres, and in Colorado the demand for the hay as a winter feed for cattle and sheep has been an incentive for the sowing of many thousands of acres each year.

As a feed for the dairy cow it has no superior. Dairymen in the West say that in the future the alfalfa-fed cow will set the price for butter for the entire country. The quality of butter produced from it is superior. Herds of cattle cannot be turned into the fields to graze as there is danger of what the farmers call "bloat," and cattle, after eating the green, rank growth too freely have died in a few hours. It can be safely fed from the stack. The stock and dairy men have talked for years of the much-sought-after "balanced ration." Alfalfa solves the problem, for stock will eat just enough of it along with grain. Analyses of bran and alfalfa have shown that they have a composition nearly the same. Horses pastured on the fields in the spring and summer and fed the hay in the winter keep in the best of condition. Hogs thrive in the fields and experiments have shown a ton of the hay to make 868 pounds of pork. Lambs can be fattened for the market in less time and with greater profit on alfalfa than on any other feed. It is an excellent feed for beef cattle and adds weight quickly and cheaply.

At Kearney, the centre of the industry in Nebraska, Mr. H. D. Watson, one of the recognized authorities on the subject, owns an alfalfa farm of 2500 acres where the plant grows as rank as weeds. The roadsides are lined with it. Mr. Watson took ground which had been planted to corn for years and years until it was "worn out." He sowed it to alfalfa. He proved to the farmers that the value of the rotation of crops was not a theory but a fact. From land that had become worthless for corn he harvested three tons of alfalfa the second year. He had faith in alfalfa and he saved the farmers in the vicinity of Kearney, who had lost heart because their worn-out land would not yield corn. A Western boom had broken and left its effect. A half-dozen years ago a farmer, who was ready to give up, took Mr. Watson's advice. He sowed twenty-two and one-half acres to alfalfa. In 1902 he sold 1000 bushels of seed for $1000 and the hay for $350. At Kearney the people call alfalfa "the greatest income-producer, mortgage-lifter and debt-paying crop grown."

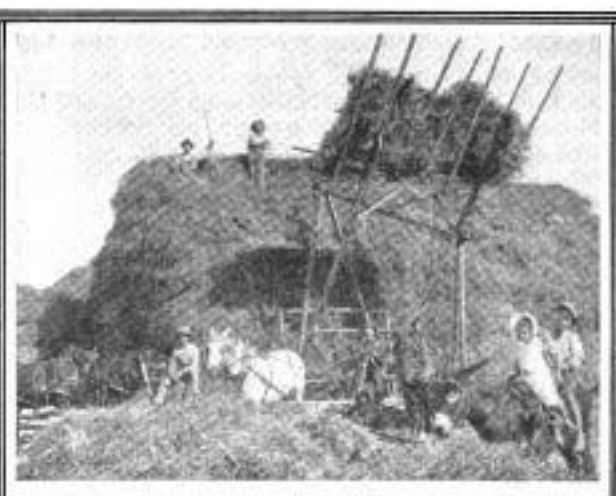
William Scully, of Washington, D. C., who owns 200,000 acres of farm land in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska and Illinois, requires in his leases that the tenants on his farms raise a fair acreage of alfalfa. He believes in the crop and feels certain that by raising it his tenants will not only improve his lands but that his rents will be forthcoming. Frank Rockefeller, the Cleveland millionaire, has 500 acres of alfalfa on his ranch in Kiowa County, Kansas.

Alfalfa, or lucern, is one of the plants belonging to the order of Leguminosæ. Botanically it is known as Medicago sativa. The same order includes peas, beans, clover and vetch. It has been demonstrated that in association with bacterial organisms, alfalfa has the power of utilizing the nitrogen of the air, a most important element in plant food, easily exhausted from the soil and difficult to replace. It requires three years for the plant to reach its prime, and twenty-five years, with three to five cuttings annually, have left the fields in excellent condition, although the decline may be expected in ten years.

Roots That Dig Their Own Wells

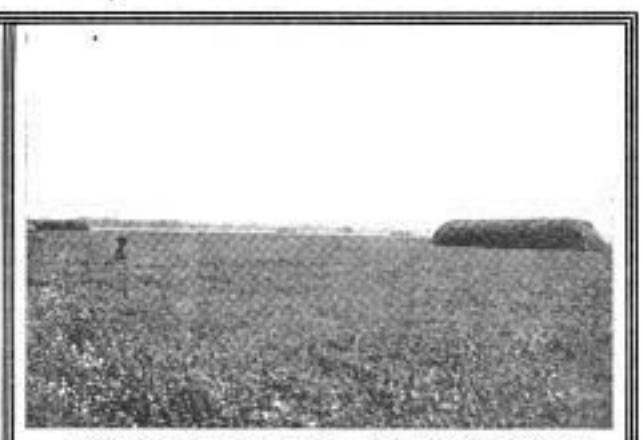
ALFALFA sends its roots to where there is no drought. An eight-year-old plant, in a stiff "hard-pan" subsoil, has been followed for a depth of ten feet without the end of the tap root being found. Many instances have been recorded of the roots penetrating thirty-eight feet and sixty-six feet. A mining tunnel was excavated in Nevada one hundred and twenty-nine feet below an alfalfa field and the roots of the plants were found in the roof of the opening. The searching roots not only obtain food far below the shallow feeding plants but when the large boring roots decay they leave their own fertilizing ingredients and openings for air and water to penetrate. Alfalfa thrives best in the sandy loams of the creek and river valleys in a warm climate with only a moderate rainfall, but it is grown successfully on the uplands and prairies. It grows in altitudes from 8000 feet down to sea level, but is seriously affected by cold, wet winters. A plant eighteen years old, with three hundred and thirty-four stems growing from one root, with a height of fifty-two inches above the ground, is the product of a Kansas field. During 1901, an extremely dry year, five cuttings were made on an eleven-acre field in Montgomery County, of the same State. The five cuttings aggregated fourteen feet two inches in height and the average yield was seven and three-fourths tons per acre. The cuttings yielded as follows: first, May 11, two and one-half tons; second, June 24, two tons; third, July 21, one ton; fourth, August 27, one and one-half tons; fifth, October 19, three-fourths of a ton. Cutting helps alfalfa the same as plucking the blossoms increases the flowering of sweet-pea vines.

The First of Forage Plants



AN EXPERIMENT made by the Nebraska Experimental Station at Lincoln, to show the comparative yields of forage plants and tame grasses, proved that the yield of one cutting of alfalfa was from four to six times greater than the others. The experiment gave the yields per acre as follows: June clover, 2365 pounds; Mammoth clover, 2375 pounds; Alsike clover, 2065 pounds; alfalfa (first cutting), 4080 pounds; blue grass, 2875 pounds; orchard grass, 2390 pounds; timothy grass, 2800 pounds; red top grass, 2350 pounds; meadow fescue, 1875 pounds; tall meadow oat grass, 3000 pounds; timothy, blue grass and orchard grass together, 1015 pounds. This gave alfalfa first place by 1080 pounds over its nearest competitor, the oat grass, but this was only the first cutting for the alfalfa field and two cuttings followed, while the other fields were not cut the second time. With the three cuttings, and a fourth crop estimated at 1800 pounds, the alfalfa field yielded 12,720 pounds, or six and one-half tons per acre. The next best record was a ton and a half.

Bees make the best of honey from the nectar of the purple alfalfa blossoms. With the cultivation of the crop on the prairie farms came the apiaries. Bee-hives are now to be found where a few years ago bees were unthought of. Some place the qualities of the blossoms as a feed for bees above the buckwheat, and red and white clover blossoms. In a country where the crop is grown extensively bees have been known to have a continual feed from May 10 to October 16. The flow is normally from June to October. Alfalfa is also considered an excellent feed for poultry. The leaves are valuable to color the yolk of eggs in winter.



In California alfalfa has been cultivated extensively for many more years than in the Middle States. Many wonderful stories are told of profits made in that State from the fields under irrigation. One is of a field of twenty-five acres which yielded over $2000 worth of hay in one year. On the Pacific Coast the first crop is often harvested in April and the last in November. In the San Joaquin Valley the feeding of 350 cows on 500 acres has been claimed. California, Utah and Colorado are the only States where the crops are grown extensively under irrigation. In Colorado the winter feeding of sheep on alfalfa hay has become a gigantic industry.

ALL THE MISERY AND LONGING OF MONTHS WENT OUT IN THAT LETTER

The Awakening of Georgé Raymond

By Lloyd Osbourne

CHAPTER III

RAYMOND saw a great deal of Miss Latimer in the month before they sailed. Quintan took him constantly to the house, where in his capacity of humble and devoted comrade the tall quartermaster was always welcome and made much of. Mrs. Quintan was alive to the value of this attached follower who might be trusted to guard her son in the perils that lay before him. She treated him as a sort of cross between a valet, a nurse and a poor relation, asking him all sorts of intimate questions about Howard's socks and underclothing and holding him altogether responsible for the boy's welfare. Her tone was one of anxious patronage, touching at times on a deeper emotion, when she often broke down and cried. The quartermaster was greatly moved by her trust in him. The tears would come to his own eyes and he would try in his awkward way to comfort her, promising that so far as it lay with him, Howard should return safe and sound. In his self-abnegation it never occurred to him that his own life was as valuable as Howard Quintan's. He acquiesced in the understanding that it was his business to get Howard through the war unscratched at whatever risk or peril to himself.

Those were wonderful days for him. To be an intimate of that splendid household, to drive behind spanking bays with Miss Latimer by his side, to take tea at the Waldorf with her and other semi-divine beings—what a dazzling experience for the ex-clerk whose lines so recently had lain in such different places. Innately a gentleman, he bore himself with dignity in this new position, with a fine simplicity and self-effacement that was not lost on some of his friends. His respect for them all was unbounded. For the mother, so majestic, so awe-inspiring; for Howard, that handsome boy whose exuberant Americanism was untouched by any feeling of caste; for Melton and Hubert Henry, his brothers, those lordly striplings of a lordly race; for Miss Latimer, who in his heart of hearts he dared call Christine, and who to him was the embodiment of everything adorable in women. Yes, he loved her; confessed to himself that he loved her; humbly and without hope, with no anticipation of anything more between them, overcome, indeed, that his presumption should go thus far.

He did not attempt to hide his feeling for her, and though too shy for any expression of it and withheld besides by the utter impossibility of such a suit, he betrayed himself to her in a thousand artless ways. He asked for no higher happiness than to sit by her side, looking into her face and listening to her mellow voice. He was thrice happy were he privileged to touch her hand in passing a teacup. Her gentleness and courtesy, her evident consideration, the little peeps she gave him into a nature gracious and refined beyond anything he had ever known, all transported him with unreasoning delight.

She, on her part, so accustomed to play a minor rôle herself in her sister's household, was yet too much a woman not to like an admirer of her own. She took more pains with her dress, looked at herself more often in the glass than she had done in years. It was laughable; it was absurd; and she joined as readily as any one in the mirth that Raymond's devotion excited in the family, but deep down within her she was pleased. At the least it showed she had not grown too old to make men love her; it was the vindication of the mounting years; the time, then, had not yet come when she had ceased altogether to count. She had lost her nephews, who were growing to be men; the love she put by so readily when it was in her reach seemed now more precious as she beheld her faded and diminished beauty, the crow's-feet about her eyes, her hair turning from brown to gray. A smothered voice within her said: "Why not?"

She analyzed Raymond narrowly in the long tête-à-têtes they had together. She drew him out, encouraging and pressing him to tell her everything about himself. She was always apprehending a jarring note, the inevitable sign of the man's coarser clay, of his commoner upbringing, the clash of his caste on hers. But she was struck instead by his inherent refinement, by his unformulated instincts of well-doing and honor. He was hazy about the use of oyster-forks, had never seen a finger-bowl, committed before her eyes a dozen little solecisms which he hastened to correct by frankly asking her assistance; but in the true essentials she never had to feel any shame for him. Clumsy, diffident, ignorant of all the social amenities, he was yet a gentleman.

The night before they were to sail he came to say good-by. The war had at last begun in earnest; men were falling; and the Spaniards were expected to make a desperate and bloody resistance. It was a sobering moment for every one, and in all voices, however hard they tried to make them brave and gay, there ran an undercurrent of solemnity. Howard and Raymond were to be actors in that terrible drama not yet played; stripped and powder-blackened at their guns they were perhaps doomed to go down with their ship and find their graves in the Caribbean Sea. Before them lay untold possibilities of wounds and mutilation, of disease, suffering and horror. What woman that knew them could look on unmoved at the sight of these men, so grave and earnest, so quietly resolute, so deprecatory of anything like braggadocio or overconfidence. It filled Christine Latimer with a fierce pride in herself and them; in a race that could breed men so gentle and so brave; in a country that was founded so surely on the devoted hearts of its citizens.

She was crying as Raymond came in to her later the same evening and found her sitting in the far end of the drawing-room with the lights turned low. They were alone together, for Howard was with his mother and his brothers gathered in a farewell group about the library fire. Miss Latimer took both of Raymond's hands, and with no attempt to disguise her sorrow, drew him close beside her on the divan. She was overflowing with pity for this poor fellow whose life had been so hard, in which until now there had been neither love nor friends, whose only human tie was to his mother and to her. Had he known it he might have put his arms about her, kissed her tear-swollen eyes and drawn her head against his breast.

She was filled with a pent-up tenderness for him; a word, and she would have discovered what was until then inarticulate in her bosom. But the tall quartermaster was withheld from such incredible presumption. Her beautiful gown against his common serge typified as it were the gulf between them. Her distress, her agitation were in his mind due to her concern for Howard Quintan; and he told her again and again, with manly sincerity, that he would take good care of her boy.

She knew he loved her. It had been plain to her for weeks past. She knew every thought in his head as he sat there beside her, thrilled with the touch of her hands and in the throes of a respectful rapture.

Again and again the avowal was on his lips; he longed to tell her how dear she was to him; it would be hard to die with that unsaid were he to be amongst those who never returned. It never occurred to him that she might return his love. A woman like her!

She could easily have helped him out. More than once she was on the point of doing so. But the woman in her rebelled at the thought of taking what was the man's place. She had something of the exaggerated delicacy of an old maid. It was for him to ask, for her to answer; and the precious moments slipped away. At last, greatly daring, he managed to blurt out the fact that he wanted to ask a favor.

Her hands tightened on his.

"A favor?" she said.

"Won't you give me something," he said timidly, "some little thing to take with me to remember you by?"

She replied she would with pleasure. She wanted him to remember her. What was it that he would like?

"There is nothing I could refuse you," she said, smiling.

Raymond was overcome with embarrassment. She saw him looking at her hair; her hair which was her greatest beauty, and which when undone was luxuriant enough to reach her waist. He had often expressed his admiration for it.

"What would you like?" she asked again.

"Oh, anything," he faltered. "A—a book!"

She could not restrain her laughter. A book! She laughed and laughed. She seemed carried away by an extraordinary merriment. Raymond thought he had never heard a woman laugh like that before. It made him feel very badly. He wondered what it was that had made his request so ridiculous. He thanked his stars he had held his tongue about the other thing. Ah, what a fool he had been. He could not have borne it had the other been received with the same derision.

"I shall give you my prayer-book," she said at last, wiping her eyes and looking less amused than he had expected. "I've had it many years and value it dearly. It is prettily bound in Russia, and if you carry it in the proper place romance will see that it stops a bullet—though a Bible, I believe, is the more correct."

Somehow her tone sounded less cordial. She had withdrawn her hands, and her humor, at such a moment, jarred on him. In spite of his good resolutions he had managed to put his foot into it, after all. Perhaps she had begun to suspect his secret and was displeased. He departed feeling utterly wretched and out of heart, and he got very scant comfort from his book, for it only reminded him of how seriously he had compromised himself. He was in two minds whether or not to send it back, but decided not to do so in fear lest he might give fresh offense. The next day at dawn the Casco sailed for the scene of war.

CHAPTER IV

THEN followed the animating days of the blockade; the first landing on Cuba; the suspense and triumph attending Cervera's capture; El Caney; San Juan Hill; Santiago; and the end of the war. Howard Quintan felt ill with fever and was early invalided home; but Raymond stayed to the finish, an obscure spectator, often an obscure actor, in that world-drama of fleets and armies. Tried in the fire his character underwent some noted changes. He developed unexpected aptitudes, became a marksman of big guns, showed resource and skill in boat-work, earned the repeated commendations of his superiors. He put his resolution to the test, and emerged surprised, thankful and satisfied to find that he was a brave man. He rose in his own esteem; it was borne in on him that he had qualities that others often lacked; it was inspiriting to win a reputation for daring, fearlessness and responsibility.

He wrote when he could to his mother and Miss Latimer, and at rare intervals was sometimes fortunate enough to hear in turn from them. His mother was ill; the strain of his absence and danger was telling on her enfeebled constitution; she said she could not have got along at all had it not been for Miss Latimer's great kindness. It seemed that the old maid was her constant visitor, bringing her flowers, taking her drives, comforting her in the dark hours when her courage was spent. "A good and noble woman," wrote the old lady, "and very much in love with my boy."

That line rang in Raymond's head long afterward. He read it again and again, bewildered, tempted and yet afraid to believe it true, moved to the depths of his nature, at once happy and unhappy in the gamut of his doubts. It could not be possible. No, it could not be possible. Standing at the breech of his gun, his eyes on a Spanish gunboat they had driven under the shelter of a fort, he found himself repeating: "And very much in love with my boy. And very much in love with my boy." And then, suddenly becoming intent again on the matter in hand, he lent a twist to the breech-mechanism and gave the enemy a six-inch shell that tore him fore and aft.

Then there came the news of his mother's death. As much a victim of the war as any stricken soldier or sailor at the front, she was numbered on the roll of the fallen. The war had killed her as certainly, as surely, as any Mauser bullet sped from a tropic thicket. Raymond had only the consolation of knowing that Miss Latimer had been with her at the last and that she had followed his mother to the grave. Her letter, tender and pitiful, filled him with an inexpressible emotion. His little world now held but her.

This was the last letter he was destined to receive from her. The others, if there were others, all went astray in the chaotic confusion attendant on active service. The poor quartermaster, when his ship was so lucky as to take a mail aboard, grew accustomed to be told that there was nothing for him. He lost heart and stopped writing himself. What was the use? he asked. Had she not abandoned him? The critical days of the war were over; peace was assured; the victory won, the country was already growing forgetful of the victors. Such were his moody reflections as he paced the deck, hungry for the word that never came. Yes, he was forgotten. There could be no other explanation of that long silence. He was forgotten!

He returned in due course to New York and was paid off and mustered out of the service. It was dusk when he boarded an uptown car and stood holding to a strap, jostled and pushed about by the unheeding crowd. Already jealous of his uniform he felt a little bitterness to see it regarded with such scant respect. He looked out of the windows at the lighted streets and wondered whether any of those hurrying thousands cared a jot for the men who had fought and died for them. The air, so sharp and chill after the tropics, served still further to dispirit him and add the concluding note of depression to his home-coming. He got off the car and walked down to Fifth Avenue, holding his breath as he drew near the Quintans' house. He rang the bell. Waited and rang again. Then at last the door was unlocked and opened by an old woman.

"Is Miss—Mrs. Quintan at home?" he asked.

"Gone to Europe," said the old woman.

"But Miss Latimer?" he persisted.

"Gone to Europe," said the old woman.

"Mr. Howard Quintan?"

"Gone to Europe!"

He walked slowly down the steps, not even waiting to ask for their address abroad nor when they might be expected to return. They had faded into the immeasurable distance. What more was there to be said or hoped? And his dejected heart gave back the answer: Nothing. He slept that night in a cheap hotel. The next day he bought a suit of civilian clothes and sought the office of the auditor's department. Here he received something more like a welcome. Many of the clerks with whom he had scarcely been on nodding terms now came up and shook him warmly by the hand. The superintendent sent for him and told him that his place had been held open, hinting, in the exuberance of the moment, at a slight increase of salary. The assistant superintendent made much of him and invited him out to luncheon. The old darky doorkeeper greeted him like a long-lost parent. Raymond went back to his desk and resumed, with a sort of melancholy satisfaction, the interrupted routine of twenty years. In a week he could hardly believe he had ever quitted his desk. He would shut his eyes and wonder whether the war had not been all a dream. He looked at his hands and asked himself whether they indeed had pulled the lanyards of cannon, lifted loaded projectiles, had held the spokes of the leaping wheel. His eyes, now intent on figures, had they in truth ever searched the manned decks of the enemy or trained the sights that had blown Spanish blockhouses to the four winds of Heaven? Had it been he or his ghost who had stood behind the Nordenfeldt shields with the bullets pattering against the steel and stinging the air overhead? He or his ghost, barefoot in the sand that sopped the blood of fallen comrades, the ship shaking with the detonation of her guns, the hoarse cheering of her crew reëchoing in his half-deafened ears? A dream, yes—tragic and wonderful, filled with wild, bright pictures; incredible, yet true!

He was restless and lonely. He dreaded his evenings which he knew not how to spend; dreaded the recurring Sunday, interminable in duration, whose leaden hours seemed never to reach their end. His only solace was in his work, which took him out of himself and prevented him from thinking. He made a weekly pilgrimage past the Quintans' house. The blinds were always drawn. It was as dead as one of those Cuban mills, standing in the desolation of burned fields. Once, greatly daring, and impelled by a sudden impulse, he went to the door and requested the address of his friends.

"Grand Hotel, Vevey, Switzerland."

He repeated the words to himself as he went back to his boarding-house; repeated them again and again like a child going on an errand—Grand Hotel, Vevey, Switzerland—in a sort of panic lest he might forget them. He tossed that night in his bed in a torment of indecision. Ought he to write? Ought he to take the risk of a reply, courteous and cold, that he felt himself without the courage to endure? Or was it not better to put an end to it altogether and accept like a man the inevitable no of her decision?

He rose at dawn, and lighting the gas went back to bed with what paper he could lay his hands on. He had no pen, no ink, only the stub of a pencil he carried in his pocket. How it flew over the ragged sheets under the fevered spell of his determination! All the misery and longing of months went out in that letter. Withheld no longer, he found the expression of a passionate and despairing eloquence. He could not live without her; he loved her; he had always loved her; before he had been daunted by the inequality between them, but now he must speak or die. At the end he asked her, in set, old-fashioned terms, whether or not she would marry him.

He mailed it as it was, in odd sheets and under the cover of an official envelope of the railroad company. He dropped it into the box and walked away, wondering whether he wasn't the biggest fool on earth and the most audacious; and yet stirred and trembling with a strange satisfaction. After all, he was a man; he had lived as a man should, honorably and straightforwardly; he had the right to ask such a question of any woman and the right to an honest and considerate answer. Be it yes or no, he could reproach himself no longer with perhaps having let his happiness slip past him. The matter would be put beyond a doubt forever, and if it went against him, as in the bottom of his heart he felt assured it would, he should try to bear it with what fortitude he might. She would know that he loved her. There was always that to comfort him—she would know that he loved her.

He got a postal guide and studied out the mails. He learned the names of the various steamers, the date of their sailing and arriving, the distance of Vevey from the sea. Were she to write on the same day she received his letter he might hear from her by the Touraine. Were she to wait a day her answer would be delayed for the Normandie. All this, if the schedule was followed to the letter and bad weather or accident did not intervene. The shipping news became the only part of the newspaper he read. He scanned it daily with anxiety. Did it not tell him of his letter speeding overseas? For him no news was good news, warning him that all was well. He kept himself informed of the temperature of Paris; the temperature of Nice; and worried over the floods in Belgium.

Then came the time when his letter was calculated to arrive. In his mind's eye he saw the Grand Hotel at Vevey, a Waldorf-Astoria set in snowy mountains, with attendant Swiss yodelling on inaccessible summits, or getting marvels of melody out of little hand-bells, or making cuckoo clocks in top-swollen châlets. The letter would be brought to her on a silver salver, exciting perhaps the stately curiosity of Mrs. Quintan and questions embarrassing to answer. It was a pity he used that railroad envelope! Or would it lie beside her plate at breakfast, as clumsy and unrefined as himself, amid a heap of scented notes from members of the nobility. Ah, if he could but see her face and read his fate in her eyes!

When he returned home that night there was a singular-looking telegram awaiting him on the hall table. His hands shook as he took it up, for it suddenly came over him that it was a cable. It had never occurred to him that she might do this; that there was anything quicker than the mail.

Sailing by Touraine, arriving sixth.

"DID YOU REALLY WANT ME?" SHE SAID

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶ Fast living makes a slow liver.

¶ Blind fools go into blind pools.

¶ Religion is of two kinds—deeds and creeds.

¶ Many persons mistake themselves for personages.

¶ The servant question: Will she stay a whole week?

¶ The keenest critic of the sculptor is the stone-cutter.

¶ The blind man's dog despises the frivolity of other dogs.

¶ A man never catches up with his good intentions for to-morrow.

¶ A man never brags about that of which he has good reason to be proud.

¶ None but the brave deserve the bear—and President Roosevelt has gone West.

¶ People will be illogical. The longer the day the shorter they like the sermon.

¶ Buying a new baby-grand for the music-room doesn't help solve the race suicide question.

¶ Practical philosophy is not to want anything enough to be disappointed when you don't get it.

¶ An anomaly, my son, is a newspaper that asks for advertisements and yet refuses to advertise itself.

¶ Venezuela must be advertised even if Castro has to resign for all the editions of the afternoon papers.

¶ Engaged young people should remember that of engagements only fifteen per cent. end in marriage.

¶ Fashion has decreed another shirtwaist season and sweltering man wonders when he will get woman's rights.

¶ Circumstances are the nails on which the weak hang their failures, but with which the strong clinch their successes.

¶ Manners improve. There is nothing in the records to show that the passengers on the ark adopted resolutions praising Noah's seamanship.

¶ When the House of Representatives has completed its plans for the taking of roll-calls by the use of electric buttons and annunciators, the Senate might keep up the good work by installing a phonograph to succeed Senator Morgan.

Doubling the Navy Without Cost

THE traveler who sat down by a river and waited for the water to flow by has been vindicated. The Senate sat down by the stream of Mr. Morgan's eloquence, and at last its patience has been rewarded by a miracle. The seemingly exhaustless flood has trickled to an end. The Panama Canal treaty is ratified.

That means, among many other far-reaching effects, a form of naval expansion to which neither the friends nor the opponents of great armaments can take exception. By enabling us to shift our fleets from the Atlantic to the Pacific at need it increases the strength of our navy by fifty per cent. without calling for a dollar for new ships. At the same time it is a productive investment, worth even more in peace than in war.

Even England, whose existence as a great Power depends upon her fleet, is beginning to take fright at the appalling expense of the new international race for mighty navies. In introducing the estimate of $180,000,000 for naval expenses for the coming year, the greatest ever known in peace or war, and equivalent to the entire cost of the Panama Canal, the Secretary of the Admiralty felt compelled to express the hope that some way might be found of keeping these gigantic unproductive expenses within limits.

One way of reaching that desirable end is to improve the efficiency of the fleets in existence. The Russians have revived their plan for connecting the Baltic and Black Seas by a ship canal, which at the moderate expense of less than a hundred million dollars will open a waterway twelve hundred miles long through the heart of the empire and double the efficiency of the Russian fleet. With such a thoroughfare in existence a Russian squadron blockaded before St. Petersburg could emerge in the Black Sea. It would be equivalent to a dozen new battleships, and yet its cost would not be an unproductive expenditure. It would be paying its way in time of peace.

The French have a similar plan for a ship canal from the Bay of Biscay to the Mediterranean, and what the Kiel Canal has done for the naval strength of Germany need not be repeated. But the best opportunity in the whole world for the reinforcement of national defense by inland waterways is right here on the Atlantic coast of the United States. The enlargement of the Delaware and Raritan and Delaware and Chesapeake Canals to ship-canal size would cost less than a single annual appropriation for new war-vessels, and it would be worth more to us strategically than twenty battleships. With such a passage open, a fleet in New York harbor would have four available exits—by Long Island Sound, by Sandy Hook, by the Delaware and by the Chesapeake—and the combined navies of the world could not blockade it. A little additional expense would open a fifth exit through Albemarle Sound. There are no engineering difficulties anywhere on the route, and such an inland waterway would pay for itself over and over again if no shot were ever fired. Think of being able to ship freight from New York to Philadelphia across New Jersey in an ocean steamer, and then by another short cut to Baltimore, Washington and Richmond.

Spring Chickens of the Thirties

IN THIS age of young men it is well to remember those who have carried their youth beyond threescore years and who are leaders and workers in the life and thought of the times. There are men who never grow old. They defeat age by the force of their activities.

Many of them are reaching new birthday anniversaries this spring. Take, for instance, two of the most remarkable: Grover Cleveland, sixty-six on the eighteenth of March, and J. Pierpont Morgan, sixty-six on the seventeenth of April. No one will question the right of each to preëminence, and they illustrate some very interesting phases of American life. Cleveland, owing to the circumstances that attend the work of a pastor as the breadwinner of the family, received only a preparatory school education. Morgan, the able son of a wealthy father, got the best that the schools of his own country and the universities of Germany could furnish. Speculating upon the future of the two young men, of almost equal age, the opinion would have been practically unanimous that the banker's son would reach higher in public life and the preacher's son of necessity would plod his way upward in business. But fortune has a way of reversing the guesses of mankind, and in this case the one became the astonishing financial figure of the century and the other was twice elected to the greatest office in the world.

There is another interesting fact. Some would suppose that Mr. Cleveland, in viewing what he had accomplished with a limited education, would be a champion of the early quitting of textbooks. And yet we find him one of the most powerful pleaders for the value of a college training that the country has ever known, and he has his largest happiness in the shadow of a great university to which he devotes much of his attention. There is no reversal of sentiment in the case of Mr. Morgan, so far as education goes, for it will be recalled that he has surrounded himself in his work with men of university experience. This agreement of view is another expression of the general conviction that the best asset of a young man nowadays is a college education.

In the springs of the thirties some charm seemed to have been at work among the new-born. We find in the list of those who are meeting new birthdays at this season such men as Chauncey M. Depew, sixty-nine on April 22; Wayne MacVeagh, seventy on April 19; President Eliot, sixty-nine on March 20; John Burroughs, sixty-six on April 3, Ambassador Horace Porter, sixty-six on April 15; Bishop Coleman, sixty-six on May 3; Bishop Potter, sixty-eight on May 25—and so on until a long and notable list might be given, including many women who might not like the statistics.

Depew, MacVeagh and Porter still tell funny stories, make delightful after-dinner speeches and rise to great occasions, and there is cheerfulness and boyishness in what they think and do. John Burroughs finds more joy in Nature than even in his boyhood days. Bishop Coleman takes his summer vacation by walking in rough garb hundreds of miles through a wilderness. Bishop Potter works harder than three average men and tells a new anecdote with the chuckle of a half-century ago. President Eliot keeps ahead of the swiftness of the day.

No one can accurately measure the influences that make a year or a decade fruitful of special greatness or usefulness. We only know that in the ten years from 1830 to 1840 there was an exceptional crop of babies from which came men who are making fine achievements in life, and who have in them wellsprings of cheerfulness and buoyancy. They show the advantages of a college education, but they illustrate still more forcibly the true value of work as an invigorator and renovator of the happy life. It doesn't seem at all aged to be sixty-six or seventy in these fortunate days. Thousands of our best men are that old and work long hours and do not need the doctors.

There is no reason why the decade from sixty to seventy should not be the golden span of active life. By sixty a man has had a reasonably good experience with the world; he knows its ups and downs personally or by observation; he has adequate time to test friendships, to see the fun of running for office, to change his dogmas several times, to get married more than once, and to find out that he himself does not represent the knowledge and wisdom of the whole world.

Is it Peace in Ireland?

IF IRELAND is really going to be pacified after seven hundred years the world will lose a picturesque element in literature and life. When the Irishman no longer has a hated Saxon at hand what will he do for a "scrap"?

The land bill that is to perform this miracle affects directly half a million tenants, who with their families represent a majority of the people of Ireland, and indirectly it affects the entire population. The disappearance of the landlords and the substitution of a system of peasant proprietors would transform the entire national life. If it can make Ireland a loyal member of the empire the $60,000,000 the British Government proposes to give to the enterprise will have been cheaply spent.

When the Liberals were dallying with Home Rule they always had an uneasy feeling that in the end the Tories might sneak in ahead of them, as they did in the matter of free trade. The outlook in that direction is very promising now. Of course, a land-purchase bill is not Home Rule, but if the land question can be settled the principal obstacle to Home Rule will have been removed. It was the fear that an Irish Parliament would not deal fairly with them that made the landlords fight Gladstone's scheme with the energy of desperation. It was the influence of the landlords that embittered the resistance of Ulster and stiffened the backbone of the English aristocracy. With the land question settled, Home Rule would be neither so ardently desired on one side nor so anxiously dreaded on the other.

If Saxon and Celt make up their differences in Ireland what will happen in America? It will be hard to recognize our politics without the "Irish vote" massed for the single purpose of making things uncomfortable for the British oppressor. If we should live to see several million Irish-Americans taking as much interest in keeping us on good terms with England as our other millions of German-Americans take in keeping us friends with Germany, what a queer state of things there would be! A politician of the O'Donovan Rossa and Finerty era would need a guide to help him find his way about.

Considering the strategic position of Ireland at the throat of their empire it would be well worth the while of the British authorities to pacify her at any reasonable cost, even if there were nothing more than the island itself to be taken into account. But only a quarter of the Irishmen in the world live in Ireland. The rest are in America and the British colonies. That multiplies the importance of the problem by about four.

Before the Phœnix Park murders the Tories were suspected of coquetting with Home Rule. It would not be surprising if they should take it up again, and "dish the Whigs" as they have done on more than one occasion before. But, of course, they will call it something else—"local self-government," perhaps. It is a long stride in that direction that in the preparation of their land bill they have even consented to consult Irish opinion.

SINFUL PECK

By Morgan Robertson

THE SALVORS

THE captives were released from the staterooms, Sinful Peck ironed in the lazarette, the yards swung under the direction of the bewildered first mate, and the big ship, gathering way under the faintest of quartering airs, forged slowly ahead; then, as the mutineers trooped forward, Captain Jackson leaned over the taffrail and vented his pent-up rage in softly spoken, but intense, profanity. The mate approached him.

"They took charge, Mr. Becker," said the Captain hotly as he turned. "They had the pistol the second mate lost, and shot him with it; then they got the drop on me, and tied me down; then they tied you and the third mate in your bunks; then they raided the cabin and got everything in the shape of a firearm that I had aboard."

"They got my pistol, too," said the mate; "but—they've gone to work."

"Yes, on my promise to pay 'em off at Singapore, fit 'em out with clothes, and pay their passage home by steamer. Though they used to be sailors, they are now—that is, the fourteen who did the business—shipowners and skippers and business men from Cleveland. You see, Sinful Peck—he's a lawyer now—made a fool bet on Bryan with Seldom Helward—who's a Lake captain now—and lost the bet. It was ten thousand cash or a voyage with me, or you, or Benson—any of us who hammered 'em 'round the Horn thirty years back—and Peck chose the voyage, and waited for me to strike New York. Then the whole bunch came down to see Sinful off, and he paid the crimp that shipped him to shanghai 'em all. That's why they're so down on him. They've got him in irons now, ostensibly for shooting Mr. Brown, but really to keep him fast, so that he'll have to finish the voyage. They seem to be influential men at home."

"Yes, Capt'n," came a voice from the lazarette below, "and there's where the fun comes in. Just you put the bloody-minded mutineers in jail; we'll make 'em finish the voyage, too."

"Shut up, down there," said the mate; and the voice subsided. Then the third mate appeared, his watery eyes blinking in anxiety.

"Mr. Brown's in a bad way, sir," he said to the Captain. "It's risky, this hot weather. What's happened, sir? He can't talk straight."

"I forgot him!" exclaimed the Captain, hurrying away.

"Mutiny, Mr. Benson," said the first mate in answer to the other's query. "Had charge for a while, and the skipper made terms with 'em. But it's mutiny just the same, and that means jail."

The mate chuckled, and again the man at the wheel turned his reproving gaze around; then, putting his hands to his mouth, the man bawled:

"Big Pig, lay aft here; I want to talk to you."

"Here—here!" roared the first mate. "What's this——"

"That will do, now—that will do!" interrupted the helmsman, patting the air in Mr. Becker's direction. "I believe the time is past when loud language is needed from you."

The mate glared hard at him, but subsided. Then Big Pig Monahan lifted his giant frame up the poop-steps and lumbered aft by the weather alley—another insult to the traditions of the sea—and with his hand on the butt of a pistol in his trousers' pocket, and his distorted eye shifting curiously from one to the other, said to the helmsman: "What's up?"

"Just this, Monahan. I was at the wheel, here, and didn't take a hand; so I only know what you've bargained for by what these men say. They're going to jail us all for mutiny. Better have things down in black and white."

Big Pig mused a few moments, then answered: "Reckon that's so. He gave his word of honor, all right, but then—he's only a poor, ignorant, forgetful saltwater skipper."

The Captain emerged from the after companion at this juncture, and Big Pig said to him: "Hear you're going to jail us for mutiny. Now, no use talking"—he raised his voice as the Captain started to speak; "get out your official log and enter in it that we men are exempt from the charge of mutiny and piracy."

"If you doubt my given word," said Captain Jackson angrily, "let me inform you that such an entry will not hold good against your names on the articles and your being in my forecastle. Under the law you are sailors or passengers."

"We are passengers."

"Then if you are passengers you cannot collect wages for the passage out, and I save that much for my owners."

"To the devil with your wages," said Big Pig contemptuously. "Eighteen dollars a month! We wouldn't kick for clothes only to look decent while we are drawing on our home banks."

"Very well. Down it goes, and we'll all sign it."

The official log—excellent evidence in court—was produced, and in it was stated that thirteen of the ship's people, whose names were on the articles as sailors, were, to all intents and purposes, passengers assisting to take the ship into Singapore; that they were not punishable for mutiny, but were not entitled to collect wages, or other emoluments, from the ship; that Captain Jackson was to fit them out with good clothing at Singapore and pay their passage to San Francisco, and—this an afterthought of Big Pig's—pay their hotel bills and keep them supplied with moderate spending money while waiting for the banks to cash their drafts, in lieu of the wages which they relinquished. But at the suggestion of the skeptical Mr. Becker the Captain insisted on amending the last clause to read that his liability for board and spending money should cease if the banks should refuse to honor the drafts. To this Big Pig agreed, and when the Captain and the two mates had signed their names, the others came aft at his behest, and the fair white page was embellished with the following euphonious cognomens: Big Pig Monahan, Seldom Helward, General Lannigan, Yampaw Gallegher, Shiner O'Toole, Turkey Twain, Jump Black, Ghost O'Brien, Gunner Meagher, Moccassey Gill, Sorry Welch, Poop-Deck Cahill and Tosser Galvin.

"Now, send it down here and I'll sign," came the voice from below.

"Not much, my joker," said Big Pig, peering down on the speaker. "You're a signed man o' the crew, and you're not in it. All you get is the skipper's mere promise of immunity from prosecution."

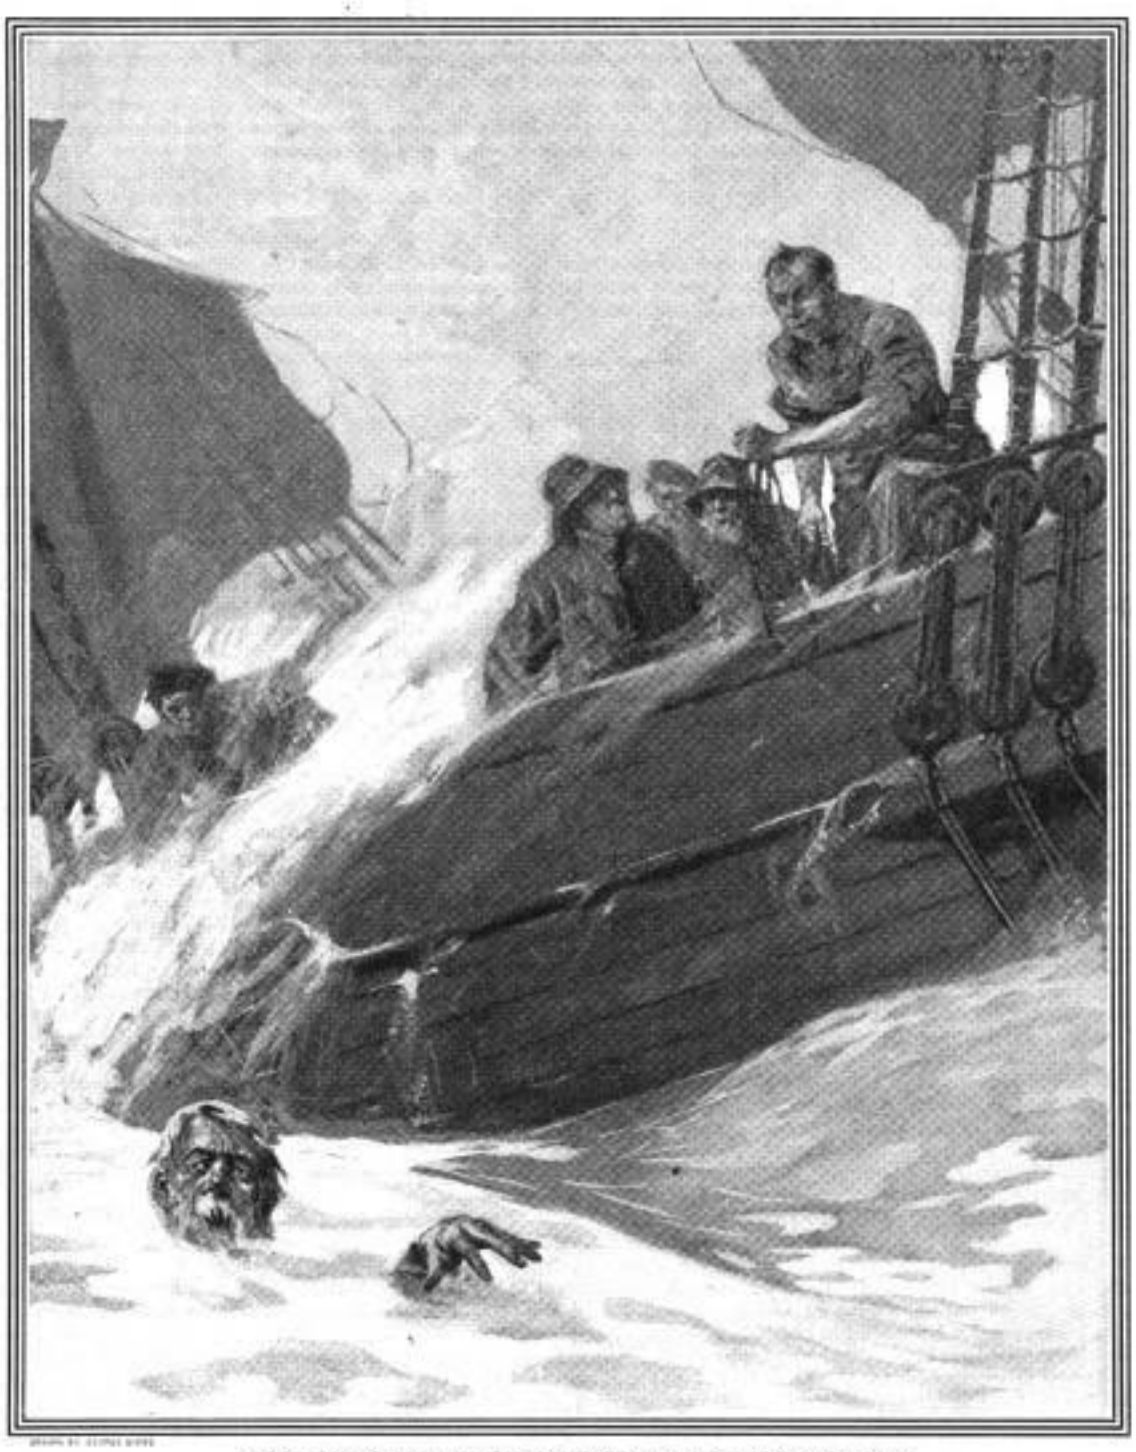
"But I will say right here," said the Captain, looking around, "that the glass is falling and I expect a typhoon. If we do not get in soon Mr. Brown will die for lack of medical skill, and in that case my promise will not avail. Peck will hang, and it may go hard with you all."

Their faces fell; and Big Pig looked questioningly around the group. One uttered the name "Sinful," and their faces lightened.

"Sinful's the man," said Big Pig. "Get him up here."

"Doctor Sinful Peck," he said sternly a few moments later, when the released prisoner had scrambled up from the dark lazarette, "how long did you practice in the hospitals before you took up law?"

"Three years, if it's any o' your business," answered Sinful, stiffening his small frame to full height, and blinking his round eyes.



"Good enough. Go down to the second mate and save his life—or hang."

"Goodness me," murmured Sinful, squinting down the hatch. "And I was so comfortable down there. First prospect of rest this voyage, and now I must go to work again."

"No joking," said Captain Jackson. "I promised not to prosecute you, and you were only ironed on the demand of these men. But if Mr. Brown dies you are up against the gallows. I cannot save you. If you have been a doctor, go down to the second mate. There is a medicine chest."

"Aye, aye, sir," answered Sinful, saluting in smiling mock respect. "Takes all trades nowadays——" But they bundled him off the poop.

He called on the steward's assistance, and two hours later soberly reported to Captain Jackson that the patient was sleeping under opiates, that he had set the fracture, that the fever would probably be under control, but that the bullet could not be extracted with the appliances on board; it was a hospital job, and meanwhile Mr. Brown would need his undivided attention, though the steward could be spared to his duties. To which the Captain, anxious over his barometer, gave a wearied acquiescence. Then, procuring a stool and a book from Mr. Brown's room, Sinful seated himself in the shade near the forward companion door, his pipe in full blast, within sound of his patient's breathing.

The air, barely moving in the morning, was still at noon, the dead stagnation only relieved by the draft from the courses as they flapped with the heave of the ship. There was a yellowish-gray appearance overhead and around, and the native craft on the horizon, with the blue rising of land to the southward, distinct in each detail at daylight, were now hidden in an impalpable haze. But by four o'clock the yellow had left the sky, leaving the gray; and across this gray from west to east moved light, feathery, cirrus clouds, and the native craft were close-hauled to an offshore breeze that darkened the sea with short, breaking waves and increased in fitful puffs. Captain Jackson again consulted the barometer, and called the thirteen aft. They came and surrounded Sinful, who after dinner had resumed his stool.

"Men," he said, "there is a typhoon coming and we've got to get sea-room. You are passengers, but—will you work?"

"Most certainly, Capt'n," answered Big Pig. "Just give your orders."

"Count me out, gentlemen," said Sinful, arising from his stool, and turning toward the companion. "I am on special duty." He passed in, followed by withering looks.

"Very well," said the Captain. "Mr. Becker, take in the royals, and get gantlines and mast-ropes aloft to send down the upper spars, if necessary. We'll keep on this tack and shorten down only as we need."

All that night they tossed and labored. By midnight they had the ship under the three lower topsails, foresail, spencer, reefed spanker and foretopmast-staysail, and hove to, taking the short, vicious seas easily, but drifting northeast into the China Sea with the St. Esprit group a menace under the lee. And by this time there was an able man less; Mr. Becker had fallen down the slippery poop-steps, spraining one ankle, breaking the other. So, Sinful had another patient in the morning, but neglected none the less his pipe, his stool and his book.

At daylight sail had been further shortened by taking in the fore and mizzen topsails and reefing the foresail; and the menacing St. Esprit group, a blue blur through the spindrift, was well on the lee quarter, away from their line of drift.

"We've cleared 'em on this tack," said Captain Jackson to the third mate, as he turned his tired, salt-stained face to leeward; "but we'll have to wear soon. The Tambelaus are right in the way. Hello"—he peered through the glasses—"there's a steamer—caught right to windward o' the St. Esprits. Look. She's steaming into it."

"Yes, sir," answered Mr. Benson after an inspection through the glasses. "I can range her. She's goin' ashore stern first."

"Well, we can't help her. We can't help ourselves if this don't change. Just look at that now." The Captain nodded to windward.

A squall, thick with rain and the spume from truncated combers, was rushing down upon them, pressing the heaving turmoil of sea to a level, and adding a louder note to the song of the storm. The ship reeled and shivered as a mighty sea boarded the weather bow.

"Man overboard!" gasped one—it was Big Pig, half-drowned. "It took Benson off the forecastle." Big Pig clung helplessly to the main fife-rail, too weak to do more than cough the water out of his lungs, and another demoralizing sea swept over the bow. Out of this deluge Captain Jackson mounted the lee rail at the main rigging and scanned the waste of gray water to leeward. A yellow sou'wester showed for a moment a hundred feet away, then sank; but there was no sign of the unfortunate third mate. Another sea—the last of the usual three, and the mightiest—lifted above them and dropped aboard. It was a Niagara; it crushed in the weather side of the forward house, but left it in place; it tore men from their grips on ropes and belaying-pins, and washed them about helplessly; it surged against the lee bulwarks and rose, a moving mountain, high over the Captain's head; and it wrenched him from the rigging and bore him away, struggling weakly in his tightly buttoned coat and long rubber boots.

A few saw him go, but only one was ready for action. Sinful Peck, in his shirt-sleeves, with the end of the fore brace tied in a long bowline over his shoulder, arose out of the washing water and climbed the rail. Whether or not he had prepared that bowline for the benefit of the third mate never appeared; but it was ready, and it was the salvation of Captain Jackson. With a ringing "Stand by to haul in!" he sprang overboard, and those who climbed the rail to watch saw him swimming bravely toward what seemed nothing more than a floating oil-skin coat. He reached it just as the men on deck had cleared away the last tangled coil of the forebrace, and they saw him slip the loop around the waist of the drowning Captain, and elevate his hand as a signal. The fourth and the following seas had not boarded the ship, and in the comparative tranquillity resulting they hauled them to the side, where Sinful caught the main chains and climbed aboard. Then they lifted the Captain up, weak, full of water, but conscious, and some assisted him aft, while Sinful, disdainfully avoiding the hearty words and claps on his back offered by the men, made his way to his patients. But the third mate was not seen again.

"Peck, you're a man," said the Captain a little later, as he visited him in the forward companion. "But what made you—for me?"

"Dunno, Capt'n. You needed a few coals of fire on your head, I think."

"Well, it's a pity there weren't more like you when the third mate went—poor devil. He's been a good man in his time, but he was old and weak. Now, I can't do much, nor say much, Peck, but I can save you some trouble. Want to be paid off, and go home with the rest?"

"Oh, no, sir. If I do I must give up ten thousand, and I can't afford it. It's a bet, you know."

"Then you'll go home in the cabin. I won't forget this in a hurry."

He offered his hand, which Sinful took, with a new and mischievous light in his eye. And when Seldom Helward, relieved from the wheel at eight bells, stopped on his way forward with an unfamiliar smile on his rugged face, and tendered him his hand in amnesty and absolution of indebtedness, Sinful declined all and waved him away.

"Want no truck with you," he declared airily. "I'll make good the bet."

At midday, the Tambelau Islands rising high to leeward, they wore ship, standing to the south on the starboard tack, and making sail as the wind moderated, until, as darkness closed down on the still troubled waters, the ship lay in nearly the same position as at daylight, with the St. Esprit group bearing on the opposite quarter. Captain Jackson had been scanning the nest of breakers to windward of the islands while the daylight lasted, and when he finally stowed the glasses in the companionway he remarked to himself, or the air, but loud enough to be heard by the ever-listening helmsman: "All gone but the bows and foremast; and they're raising the flag and lowering it."

Forward, men were climbing up and down the fore rigging, straining their eyes at the reef; and after supper one came aft. It was Big Pig Monahan, and he sauntered up to the Captain, who was again staring through the glasses, sacrilegiously smoking a clay pipe.

"Well," said the Captain as he faced him. There was indignation in the tone; for even passengers should respect shipboard etiquette.

"People over yonder, I hear," said Big Pig, pointing with his pipe.

"I suppose so."

"When Gunner came forrard he said you saw signals."

"I did; they were running the ensign up and down; they're showing a light now." The Captain again ranged his glasses.

"Well," said Big Pig after a moment's silence.

"Well, what?"

"What are you going to do?"

"What am I going to do?" asked the Captain angrily. "What can I do?"

"Run in and take 'em off."

"It can't be done."

"It can."

"I tell you it can't, and I want no argument. I'm as willing to save life as the next man, but I'm not going to wreck my ship fooling round a reef in the night-time. How'll you get a boat over, anyhow? How'll you take men off the weather side of a hulk in this sea? And how'll you get back to the ship in the teeth of it in case you got that far?"

"We can do it—all of it. You needn't do anything but show a light. Your own life was saved to-day, when by your reasoning it could not ha' been done. Sinful's been a Lake sailor. So have the rest of us."

The Captain was silent.

"We haven't talked it over," continued Big Pig. "We didn't expect opposition. I'll see what the rest say."

He went forward, and in five minutes was back, and at his heels were the dozen other troublesome malcontents—the helmsman now being one of the more expert of the landsmen.

"Is this so, Jackson," asked Poop-Deck Cahill, his smooth, distinct articulation adding weight to the scorn and contempt in his voice, "that you, just out of the jaws of death yourself, refuse to save those poor wretches down there?"

"I refuse to sanction insanity," sputtered the Captain. "I am duly grateful to those who pulled me in—more than grateful to the man who went after me. But it is quite another thing to attempt this. I know it is impossible."

"You know mighty little, when you're reduced to your lowest terms," said Seldom harshly. "You're smart enough with a crew under you that knows the work, and you're plucky enough with a handspike in your fist and a Dutchman under it. But you're the same coward who shot Monahan thirty years ago for tapping you on the nose. I've a good mind to knock your teeth down your throat on general principles, you —— educated rat." He advanced threateningly, one powerful fist clenched and drawn back.

"Steady, Helward," said Big Pig. "That's all off."

"You are all armed," said the Captain, shrinking back. "I am not."

"Armed be hanged!" said Tosser Galvin, sidling around to windward of the Captain. "We're not bucko mates. Take that for auld lang syne, you small-souled lobster." He struck Captain Jackson in the face. Then Seldom's fist shot out and he went down. Then, the example being set, they kicked him, struck him with fists as he attempted to rise and unmercifully mobbed him about his own quarter-deck, unmindful of the expostulations of Big Pig, and only desisted when he lay quiet between the lee quarter-bitt and the rail, with his hands shielding his face.

"Get up," said Poop-Deck sternly. "Consider, if it suits you better, that we are paying off scores thirty years old. We had become gentlemen since then, but in your ship have reverted to type."

"And that's entirely beside the point," said Seldom, as the Captain painfully arose to his feet. "Consider yourself again deprived of command, and ordered to stand back and forth while we go in for those poor devils on the reef. You won't shake us—you won't dare, much as you'd like to. You'll keep the riding light aloft, and wait for us."

The Captain stared around helplessly through half-closed eyes.

"You'll pay dearly for this," he said thickly. "I am master here under the law."

"And we are passengers," said Poop-Deck. "Don't forget it."

"If you change my ship's course against my wishes you are pirates."

"Now, that will do," said Big Pig. "We are life-savers, and we'll meet your charges in any court in the world. We're going to get two boats out and go in to that steamer; and you're to wait for us with a light up aloft. You've got a dozen other men besides the bosuns and carpenter. That's enough to wear ship. The wind's going down, and we'll be back by daylight; but you'd better not monkey with us. D'ye hear?"

The Captain heard, but made no answer, and Big Pig hailed down the companion, forcefully ordering the steward to fill, trim and light the riding light—the large white lantern used by ships at anchor—and hoist it to the main truck.

Then they all trooped forward to the boats, and two—Poop-Deck and Tosser—stopped on the way and interviewed Sinful Peck, working out problems in navigation on an old log slate in the second mate's room.

"Want me to go along, do you?" he said without looking up. "No; unless Captain Jackson orders me to I will not."

"All right, Sinful," said Poop-Deck; "but he won't order you. You've done well to-day, my boy, and it goes a long way toward squaring matters between you and this crowd. We thought you'd like to be with us."

"I don't. You are ingrates and blackguards. I refuse to mix with you."

"Why, you little shyster," answered Tosser angrily, "you only escaped the certainty of jail on our intercession with Jackson."

"Go away from me. I struck the first blow—which gave you the advantage. In return you consigned me to irons for fear I would swim ashore and escape paying my fool bet. Go away from me." They went, and he resumed his studies.

Forward, they were clearing away two of the boats on the house. When each was equipped and ready they marched aft in a body and, ignoring the Captain entirely, ordered the wheel put up, and conned the ship while she ran down, with yards still braced, about a mile nearer the reef. Then they again brought the ship to and, as the wind and sea were unquestionably milder, even dared to back the main yards, not only to stop headway, but to bring an overhead support for the after boat-tackles. In spite of the Captain's prophecy it was really an easy task to swing those two boats overboard, one at a time, with a man in each to unhook and to drop them back to the stern. It was done in ten minutes, and with a parting injunction to the Captain to "Keep the light lit" they swarmed down the painters, six to one boat, seven to the other, and drifted astern in the darkness.

Captain Jackson watched them off, then gave the order to swing the yards—not to leave them behind, but to bring his ship more under command; for, though the wind was moderating rapidly, there was still an ugly sea heaving out of the west, and he was not far from a ragged barrier reef. He kept an eye on the riding light at the main truck, and at one o'clock wore around and stood to the northward, enjoining upon the lookouts to watch for the boats. He was angry, exasperated and exhausted, yet bound by a human sympathy past his understanding not to desert those obstreperous men, weary as he, who had fought for the privilege of a night's boat work in a heavy sea and a half gale. And so, pacing the poop and watching, with one officer lost, the other two disabled, and Sinful Peck, the one man aboard able to help him, sleeping sweetly, the tired man passed the hours, and at daylight hearkened to a hail, faint as the voice of a telephone, coming up the wind from the gray blanket to leeward.

"Shift over the yardarm tackles, Jackson," said the hail, "and overhaul one and the midship tackle down to us. Got a heavy load."

"How many?" bawled the Captain.

"None. Give us the tackles."

The main yards were backed, and the ship being now on the other tack, the tackles were shifted and overhauled down to one of the boats, while the other pulled to the stern, and caught a line thrown by the Captain.

"Got there too late," said Big Pig as he climbed over the taffrail. "All washed off; but we found the purser's safe—hauled out on deck. Come on, you fellows."

They hurried past the Captain, who looked over the stern, made sure that the boat was secure and shipping no water, and then watched the work going on forward. They had already lifted a small safe by a yardarm tackle, and when it was high enough they tautened the midship tackle, slackened the other, and lowered it gently to the deck. Then they hooked on to the boat, the occupants swarmed up to the fore yard and inboard, and they lifted and stowed the boat in its place on the house as quickly and as skillfully as they had transferred the safe. By this time some had towed the second boat forward with a man in it, and when this was aboard they dragged the safe aft to the dry mizzen hatch, and Big Pig called up to the Captain: "Now, we're played out, Jackson, and mean to turn in after breakfast. You'll have to get along without us."

The Captain bowed gravely. "Go ahead," he said. "I will not call you unless the ship needs you." And then, to himself: "Helyons all, but—they're seamen."

They went below, and the Captain called Sinful Peck, who had come out to inspect the safe, up to him on the poop.

"Peck," he said, "I'm dead beat, and must have some sleep. Will you watch the ship, and call me if necessary?"

"Most certainly, Capt'n. Just give me the course. I'll make sail as she'll stand it, and steer the course when the wind hauls enough."

"Due west will answer until I wake up. By the way, what's their particular standing in Cleveland? Can they make trouble for me in the courts? They mopped the deck with me last night, and I don't feel patient and resigned."

"They'll make no trouble, sir," said Sinful with a smile. "They'll want the whole thing hushed up, for shame's sake."

"Well, I'll keep my bargain. I'm to fit them out and send them home, you know, and also pay their expenses until they can draw on their banks. I doubt, though, that the banks will deal with them unless I speak for them, and I feel mean enough to queer the whole thing."

He went down, and Sinful paced the deck thoughtfully.

"Draw on their banks," he muttered at last. "And what a high old time they'll have in Singapore! And what high old yarns they'll spin at home!"

Through the day, as his new duties and occasional attentions to his patients would permit, he continued his pacing and thinking, with the result that when Captain Jackson appeared, late in the afternoon, he listened to a tale—infamous enough to have emanated from a more sinful mind than Sinful Peck's—concerning the character and local reputation of the thirteen fellow-travelers; and it thoroughly impressed him. Sinful told it earnestly, as a duty deferred. He would save Captain Jackson from further extortion and blackmail, and would have spoken before had he been in a position to do so. The slander need not be detailed. It was given with a fidelity to the probable which would have secured places in the Rogues' Galleries of the world for the photographs of all.

The Captain believed; and so believing sailed his ship into Singapore harbor, dropped anchor, and went ashore in a native sampan.

The slandered thirteen, having done their duty by the ship in assisting her into port, washed up, and scoured their grimy hands with sand and bath-brick. They borrowed the carpenter's razor, and shaved, giving their sunburned faces villainous expressions by reason of the white patches developed under the three months' growth. They swore volubly at the Captain's delay, and finally, talking of their prospective salvage, mustered around the safe on the mizzen hatch. A proposition to open it and forestall deception and robbery by counting its contents met with general acceptance. But it was a burglar-proof safe with a combination lock. They spoke of cold chisels, pinch bars, and the carpenter's broad-ax, but none would do. And there was no dynamite on board.

"Here," said Big Pig, spying the observant Sinful—"Here we have it."

He collared him and led him to the safe. "Open that lock," he commanded. "You're a jack-of-all-trades."

"How can I?" said Sinful, squirming under the grip on his collar. "I don't know the combination."

"Find out. You're an expert. Get to work now, or I'll drop you overboard."

With a protesting grimace, Sinful sat down before the safe and began experimenting with the movable knob. The rest drew back, watching, and in a short time he threw open the door and arose.

"Thought you could," said Big Pig. "How easy old trades come back to us, eh, Sinful!" But Sinful scorned reply.

Inside the safe were closely packed piles of English banknotes, tied up and numbered. They unloaded the whole, and counted the amounts on each wrapper as they returned it to its place. When all were packed away they stood erect with glistening eyes, and found the Captain observing them, with Sinful at his side.

"Four hundred thousand dollars if there's a cent," exclaimed Big Pig joyously, "and fully a third of it is salvage—our salvage; for I don't see how you or your crew can get any, Jackson. You forbade the job, and not a man of you did any work."

"On the contrary, Captain Monahan," said Sinful, folding his arms with all his scant stock of dignity, "any salvage which this ship has earned will be divided between her owners, her master and her crew. You are either mutineers with no standing in court, or passengers with no right to salvage."

"What!" answered Big Pig derisively, "do you mean to say that the men who manned the boats and saved this pile will be denied a share of it?"

"I do. Since planning this voyage I read up well on marine law for my own protection. Did you ever hear of a steamship towing a disabled ship into port and sharing the salvage with her passengers? Why, you fools, we saved a big steamer from the Diamond Shoals thirty years ago. Was our claim allowed? We had to dodge policemen for a year. We were mutineers, and not even passengers. Captain Jackson, myself, and the rest of the legitimate crew here will take what salvage the owners don't get."

"You!" exclaimed several at once. "You, who slept through it all!"

"I was on special duty, and have since been made acting first mate. I order you forrard. Go forrard, the pack of you!"

"Wait, though," said the Captain to the nonplused men. "I have just talked with the Consul. There is something in the log which bears on this." He entered the cabin and returned with the official log.

"Come around me here, and listen," he said, opening the book. "As you may know," he continued when they had flocked to his side, "an entry in this log, duly witnessed by an officer has the value of an affidavit. It is legal testimony. Here are all your signatures, my own, and two of my officers to the matter above it, which is to the effect that you are passengers, not sailors, and that you are not entitled to wages, or other emoluments. Read it, all of you—other emoluments. That means that you are not entitled to salvage."

They read the fatal entry with blank faces.

"Well," said Big Pig, clearing his throat, "we'll see what the courts say."

"Very well; I will fight you to the last ditch and win. Had you shown any consideration for my position as master of this ship, doing my duty by my owners in forbidding what, in my judgment at the time, was an insane risk of property, I would now consider yours. But you did not scruple to assault me—unarmed as I was, and helpless—and for this you shall suffer. I will keep my agreement with you to the letter. Unless you force me I will make no charge of mutiny against you. Here are orders on the best clothier and furnisher in Singapore"—he took a bundle of papers from his pocket—"for thirteen suits of business clothing, hats, shoes, shirts and underwear. And here are orders on the Hotel Flannigan for board, lodging and one English shilling a day spending-money for each of you until the banks have cashed your drafts or refused to honor them. And here are thirteen steamer tickets."

"A shilling a day?" said one; "why, that won't buy drinks!"

"There is no special amount specified—only 'moderate spending-money,' and that is moderate."

"Very," said Poop-Deck dryly; "as moderate as you are, Captain. And what kind of a hotel is the Hotel Flannigan?"

"A sailors' boarding-house; but it is a licensed hotel."

They looked at him with scowling faces, and an outbreak began; but Big Pig silenced it by raising his hand.

"All right, Jackson. We know you better now, and there's no use in any more talk. We'll take the whole thing into court, and show you up, if nothing more."

They went ashore in the same boats which took the safe and the injured mates, and disappeared from the knowledge of Sinful, who moved his goods into the first mate's room, and took up his duties in discharging cargo. A month later, when ballast had been taken in for Manila, the Captain came aboard one evening with an amused expression on his face, which also held a little of anxiety.

"They're in a tight hole," he explained to Sinful. "They were so sure of their salvage that they decided to wait and get it, not knowing that the case won't be settled for a year. Their shilling a day didn't last long, nor their welcome at Flannigan's; for the banks were suspicious—the Consul warned them, you see, telling them the pedigree you gave of them—and they sold their clothes and their guns and tickets to get money to eat. They've practically starved. Flannigan told me he would ha' kept 'em in the usual way against their advance money, only there are no ships in port. Everything has been corralled by the Government for transports and colliers. And for the same reason, there are no sailors—all jumped to the Philippines. Hot times there now. I can't find a man, and that's why I listened to 'em."

"Did you ship them?" asked Sinful.

"Be aboard in the morning. Signed 'em 'fore the Consul. Are you up on navigation?"

"Pretty much, now."

"Well, Mr. Brown and Mr. Becker won't be ready, and I'll have to leave 'em. I found a second mate ashore, and you can sign on first, if you like, for the run to Manila."

"Thank you, sir. I will with pleasure."

And the little man leaned back against the rail shaking with laughter, while tears of happiness streamed down his cheeks.

SOUL SONNETS OF A STENOGRAPHER

By S. E. Kiser

XVII

I wonder if he fancies pink or blue?
  Although I'm rather dark I often think
  I'm foolish to wear nothing bright but pink,
For blue things are becoming to me, too:
I know that Teddy likes a lively hue—
  Dear Ted!—he even uses purple ink;
  But William's taste? Ah, gladly I would sink
My preference for his if I but knew.

I must contrive to always look my best,
  For men are won by looks, say what you will:
  The dear old bald-head going down the hill
Still has the little soft place in his breast,
  Still rather likes the beautiful, and still
Has eyes to notice how a girl is dressed.

XVIII

How vainly and how foolishly we plan:
  We think by subtle means to shape affairs,
  To lure the wily game within our snares,
And failure mocks us, as it only can,
Whether at Council Bluffs or Ispahan,
  Or in the orange grove or on the stairs
  We seek to play the game, she errs who dares
To fancy that she fully knows her man.

I thought, by seeming ill, to make him sad,
  And, moaning, on the office couch I fell:
  I hoped that he would smooth my brow and tell Me something tender. Oh, the shock I had!
He spoke of "whining women" and was mad—
  In future he will always find me well.

XIX

Sweet patience like consistency's a jewel;
  But, oh, it's hard to wait, and time is pressing:
  Why will the foolish doctors keep us guessing
And putter on with nostrums and with gruel
When, after all, they but prolong the duel
  That Pain and Peace are fighting, while confessing
  Down in their hearts that death would be a blessing?
It may be scientific, but it's cruel.

Why can't they let the weary soul go winging
  Its way to where angelic bands are thronging?
  Ah, surely they must know that they are wronging
The pale, exhausted sufferer by bringing Back to its clay the half-freed soul, prolonging
The woe that ends where Heaven's hosts are singing.

XX

I'll give her clothes away; I wouldn't care
  To put on things that she had worn; I'll let Her relatives have what they want and get
New things made for myself: I couldn't wear
Her garments, anyway, for she's so spare
  And faded out, while I'm a deep brunette.
  And I can have her jewels all reset
When she is gone and I am mistress there.

He's been so glad and kind to-day: no doubt
  He sees the end approaching, sees beyond
The troubled bar a poor sail passing out,
  While in the placid offing there has dawned
Upon his gaze the graceful craft and trim
That comes with long-due happiness to him.

XXI

They've given Teddy dear a little raise:
  He may turn out to be a winner yet:
  Ah, well, I'll keep him fast within the net
And let him dream of coming joyful days,
For she, alas! may fool us all. It pays
  To have a shelter handy when it's wet—
  Why cannot Fate be kind enough to let Us now and then peer down the future ways?

Last night I paused beside Ted where he sat
  And spoke about his mother: when he rose
I reached up and adjusted his cravat
And let my fingers touch his chin, whereat
  He caught my hand and started to propose—
Dear boy, I couldn't let it come to that

XXII

I hate the office boy. This morning when
  The world was seeming beautiful and bright
  The little imp came in and said: "Last night
I seen you fixin' Teddy's tie, and then
I watched you holdin' hands." I dropped my pen
  And longed to creep in somewhere out of sight:
  I'd like to wring his little neck for spite
And never look upon his like again.

I know that William heard him, too, although
  He didn't look around, for I could see
His shoulders shaking up and down, and, oh,
  I wonder if his heart beat jealously?
  If what I dream of ever comes to me
The office boy shall be the first to go.

The Castaway Brokers

fell swoop! The boasted prosperity of the republic had disappeared in a single night!

The catastrophe was so stupendous, so appalling, that for the moment they stood as if paralyzed. The President was the first one to recover the use of his stupefied mental faculties. He saw the entire financial system of the island about to be destroyed in the same calamity that had swept away its business interests.

"Stop him!" he cried. "Don't let him kill that goat! It represents the entire wealth of the republic!"

"Let him kill it!" broke in the calm voice of the Secretary of the Treasury, who was suddenly inspired with a great idea. "Let him kill it. We will then dry and cure the hide, cut it into convenient strips and store it away as collateral security for the scrip now in circulation!"

The downfall of their commerce was for the moment forgotten in their admiration for this new stroke of genius. Only one danger now beset them and this the Secretary of the Navy foresaw, in spite of the terrible blow that had fallen upon him in the loss of his second scarce-grasped fortune.

"We must follow Silas, then," he said, "and see that he does not throw the carcass into the sea!"

With this idea in mind they tore, in hot haste, through the strip of forest which separated New Chicago from the ocean.

XIV

ON THE beach a surprise awaited them. They found Silas looking intently out to sea and the forgotten goat browsing peacefully at the edge of the wood.

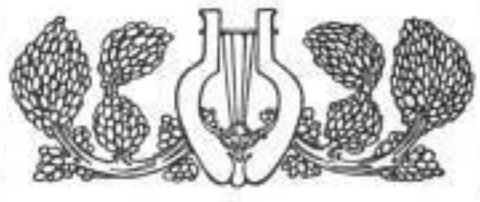
"My eyes are a little dim without my specs," said Silas, "but that looks mighty like a boat out there."

And it was a boat! A tiny boat with a bit of white cloth fluttering at its prow, and it was drifting straight for the island. Presently the solitary occupant stood up and wildly waved the bit of cloth in answer to their cheers.

It was a woman!

The cheers suddenly ceased and every man gave a hasty glance at his hands and his clothes. The boat came near enough for them to make out the features of the shipwrecked woman.

She was young and pretty!



The cheers broke out afresh and with redoubled intensity. As the boat came nearer the men stepped out into the edge of the water, but, as it beached, the Secretary of the Navy suddenly stepped from the background, shouldered in front of the President, elbowed the Vice-President aside, brushed the others out of the way with his brawny arms and offered his hand to the fair castaway.

"As Secretary of the Navy," he said, as she stepped daintily ashore, "I bid you welcome to Chicago Island!"

The young woman mechanically slipped a half-munched ship's biscuit into the bosom of her dress as she looked up at the speaker, then smiled slowly around at the others. The assembled citizens suddenly noted a fact that had entirely escaped their attention up to this time. The Secretary of the Navy was taller, stronger and handsomer than any of them! After a brief inspection of the others the new citizen of the republic slightly, but very perceptibly, snuggled up closer to him.

XV

THREE months afterward, when the good ship Orient stopped at this out-of-the-way point to repair a slightly damaged rudder, the republic had ceased to exist and Chicago Island was governed by a king and queen. The king had formerly been Secretary of the Navy. Slavery flourished in the person of poor Thomas Jefferson Jackson, but the Spirit of Liberty still lived, for Silas Gregg and the goat had established a republic of their own on the extreme point of the island.

MAKING AN ATHLETE

Proper Food the Most Important Requisite

Most health or ill health comes from the stomach, depending upon how it is fed. The athlete is very dependent upon the proper food. An athlete of Muncie, Ind., writes: "From a frail, sickly college student of scarcely six score pounds the pure food Grape-Nuts has brought me, through persistent, conscientious use, to a vigorous young athlete tipping the beam at 152 pounds. For two years the food has been to my stomach what pure air is to the lungs—a source of vigor, health and vitality.

"Having always been a great reader I frequently while at school missed my meals that I might devote the time to a favorite book, or else I hurried through the meal. This irregularity, omission and hurrying, together with the close application to study, finally told on my health until I was forced to leave school. I must have been in a truly pitiable condition from what my friends have since told me, although at the time I am sure I did not half realize the seriousness of my case. My parents decided to send me on a trip to Southern California.

"On the train I made the acquaintance of a Mr. Weissenger, a wholesale grocer of Chicago, who was interested in my case. He heard my story and advised me to try Grape-Nuts, a food greatly relished by his own family. From what he told me of the food I longed to try it, but I did not expect to find it beyond the Rocky Mountains. To my surprise on arriving at Los Angeles I noticed a box of Grape-Nuts on my aunt's sideboard. That marked the beginning of my health and comfort. Since then I have come to look upon the food Grape-Nuts as a synonym for good health and happiness." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The most artistic and durable color effects on shingles are produced with Shingletint, which is a scientific combination of linseed oil, coloring matter, creosote, and the necessary drying agents.

Among the many shingle stains offered, Shingletint is conspicuous not only for its superiority, but because it can be called for by its distinctive name, thus offering the consumer protection against inferior goods offered for the same purpose.

When buying Shingle Stains it will be worth while to ignore the "just as good" argument and insist upon Shingletint.

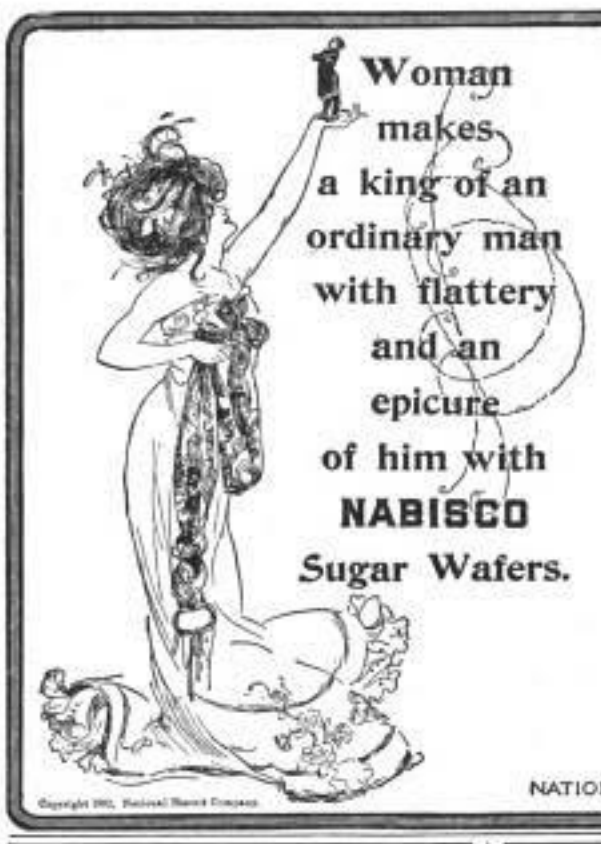
Literary Folk Their Ways and Their Work

A STORY OF WARD POLITICS—Which seems to show that one man against the crowd stands no chance.



¶ To draw a moral from a story is often to do an offensive thing, and oftener to do a stupid one. The artist is perpetually astonished and delighted—or vexed—to find his words or his brush-marks telling secrets he never knew, but it is part of the privilege of beauty to be all things to all men and to no two men the same. However convinced a man may be of the truth, it will not be the truth as he knows it that he imparts to his listener or his disciple. So with the moral—it may be the last thing the unfortunate author had in mind, but a moral of some sort there will always be while there is a reader left to extort it.

The moral of The Spoilsmen, a political story by Elliott Flower, seems to be: "Keep out of politics; it's bad business for an honest man." Both the honest men in the book who try their hands at it get the worst of the bargain. Mason, who is a small hardware merchant with a decent business and a host of friends, is persuaded to run for alderman. He wins his campaign and comes out of his term with a clean record; but his business is ruined and his friends in the ward detest him almost to a man. That he finally got a good berth with a large wholesale house is in no sense a logical deduction from his political experience—in politics he is a failure—but rather a tribute to his strict honesty and painstaking care in details—qualities which were not wanted in politics. Darnell, the other honest man, and alderman from a "silk-stocking" ward, loses his friends and wins the girl he is in love with, but, though his record is a good one, indorsed by his ward, his father makes it pretty clear to him in the last chapters that while Darnell Junior has been getting the experience Darnell Senior has been paying for it in heightened assessments and all the other petty worriments and expenses to which the machine can subject a taxpayer. "Municipal politics," he concludes, "is even dirtier than I thought. If they can't reach a man in one way, they'll get revenge in another. I believe—I've had all the political experience I want."

The action runs briskly with plenty of incident and resourcefulness—though the criticism is to be made that the story is treated rather as a vehicle for the author's knowledge of ward politics than a problem in itself, subject to its own laws of development—and Casey, the saloon-keeper, who must be a cousin of Mr. Dooley, enlivens the conversation with shrewd sarcasms.

HENRY JAMES—Is he perverse, or are we lazy, and what is one to make of his undoubted "difficulty"?

¶ It can hardly be said of Mr. Henry James that he has an audience in this country; rather one would call it a following. It seems to be taken for granted that Mr. James is a man of great talent and equal waywardness whom it is really too much bother to read. He has not waited on the public, and the public will not wait on him. But difficult as Mr. James often is, nothing can be more certain than that his difficulty is no mere inadvertence, no unsettled thought, no inadequacy of command over the medium he works in. On the contrary, his is not a muddy mind and he has something better than a style; he has style. In other words, he does with language what he wishes, and what one recognizes is not a trick of handling, an affectation of speech, but a quality of thought—in short, personality. Mr. James has been a keen student of the French masters of the short story; he appreciates to the full the value of French limpidity and precision, its sanity and common-sense, and its knack of putting its finger plump on the spot. This quality has been elsewhere remarked. "American style," said Richard Whiteing in a recent address in London, "with its extreme precision, with its highly cultivated sense of the value of the phrase, is anything but English. It aims at delicacy, and not at the rugged vigor of our best men. Henry James is as un-English as he can be." Pages of his work—take, for example, passages in a story called Flickerbridge, one of those collected in his last volume, The Better Sort—run as smooth and as translucent as fair water. It is to be noticed, too, in his choice of words that he nowhere disdains the colloquial, the slangy even. His is never the effect of such a style as Stevenson's, rich with suggestion and memoried associations, a fretted frame of deeply colored glass through which the light comes changed and glorified; it is never oratorical nor lyrical; it is, as Mr. Whiteing says, precise—precise with a French delicacy; it goes wholly along with Maupassant's theory of the right word in the right place—not the poetic word, but the apt word.

What, then, is one to make of his undoubted "difficulty"? Just this: that Mr. James' "sense of life," as he calls it, is different from that of the plain tale. "Come with me into a drawing-room," says Mr. James. "What do you get? A phrase here, a hint there, an allusion, a smile, a stare—a confession of things relevant and irrelevant from which you piece together an impression. And a conversation—what can be more indirect? How much you have to supplement what your friend tells you by what you know and what you can guess at! It is true that I am an artist, not a camera, and that the details, the hints, I give you are all indicative of the something we together, you and I, are building; but these hints, these details, you must work up yourself. I shall not give you a story ready made. You are to construct your own story, under my somewhat nebulous guidance, it is true, and at the end I shall show you, I shall somehow impress upon you the significance of our experience. That, too, you will have to divine out of your own sufficiency. I am not a preceptor, but, like you, an observer and a thinker."

Such a method takes much for granted in a world and in an age for the most part neither observant nor thoughtful of the things which interest Mr. James, but let us grant, once for all, that it is not the method of freakishness nor perversity, and that if we do not read Mr. James it is not because he is either stupid or willful, but because we are too busy or too tired.

A BOOK OF TRAVELS—To countries the author has never seen—A whimsical twist to a familiar theme.

¶ "It isn't what the beggar said, but the nawsty way he said it!" was the complaint of the hero in the topical song, and it isn't so much what the writer sees as the quality of his eyes and the "way he says it" when he tells you about it that makes the book. There will soon be brought out a little book of essays by Bernard G. Richards which gives a quaint twist to a time-worn theme. We have had books of travel and comment before—and in sufficient numbers, Heaven knows!—but never a book of travels In Countries I Have Never Seen. Mr. Richards has hit on the whimsical idea that the man who visits the country in person is the last man really to learn to know it. He quarrels with the customs official, his cabman cheats him, or his landlady skimps the fare and fattens the bill, and presto! the face of the country will never be the same to him.

Could anything be fresher, more willfully, perversely true? For instance: Paris, to Mr. Richards, is a city where all the manual labor is done by realistic novelists in search of "experience"—and France a country where nobody but the peasants in Millet's paintings ever works; China is one huge steaming laundry—so it goes. The fact is always familiar—like the eternal love story—the charm is in the way it is seen. Did not Charles Lamb make a poem out of roast pig?

SHALL WE LEARN GAELIC?—Miss Eleanor Hoyt advances an argument that will appeal to many perturbed spirits.

¶ Miss Eleanor Hoyt, the author of The Misdemeanors of Miss Nancy, has had a bad winter with that arch fiend the grippe, which, for an importation from "effete" Europe, seems to be a remarkably long-winded, able-bodied critter. She had no sooner made her first convalescence than she was overtaken, at the end of a week's work, with an attack even more severe than the first, which left her eyes in such bad shape that she has been obliged to postpone much promised literary work.

Exasperated, she avers, is hardly the word for it.

"I'm reminded," she says, "of the old Scotchman whom I met in Inverness and who solemnly urged me to learn Gaelic.

"'It's the glorious language for love-making, Miss, and sweering; ye get such a gr-r-ip o' the worrds.'"

Fine Fishing Tackle Free

I want every enthusiastic fisherman, whether amateur, beginner or professional, to have a personal knowledge of the fine points of the Shakespeare Reels and the marvelous catching qualities of the Shakespeare Baits—and to do this I propose to send to every man or woman who fishes for the real sport there is in it, one of my reels and baits for free trial on their next fishing trip. Write to-day. Send your name and address and the name and address of the leading sporting goods dealer of your city to Wm. Shakespeare, Jr., 258 Shakespeare Building, Kalamazoo, Mich. The Shakespeare Reel is especially designed for accurate and long-distance casting, and it is without doubt the best reel in the world, and you will say so when you see it. The metal used in the Shakespeare Reel is hard-drawn brass and the finest English Stubbs steel. Painstaking care is used to secure perfect accuracy in every detail. In beauty of design and simplicity of construction it is unequaled. Its easy, silent running suggests perpetual motion, and it is fitted with the most perfect drag and click ever invented. Words will not describe its beauty, its usefulness nor its many advantages over all other reels. My reels and baits are for sale by all first-class dealers, but I want you to see them and try them for yourself, and I will send them to you direct, express prepaid, for a free trial. The Shakespeare Baits are really marvelous. With them the fisherman is sure of a good catch, no matter where the fish are, in the lake or stream. If they are in deep water, Shakespeare makes the bait that attracts them. If they are in shallow water, Shakespeare makes the bait that catches them. If they are hidden in the lily pads or moss, Shakespeare makes the bait that makes them strike. And Shakespeare offers $100 in prizes for the photograph and authentic dimensions of the biggest large or small mouth bass caught this year. Write to-day for particulars. His little booklets, "How to Catch Bass," "Fine Points about Tackle," and "The Art of Bait Casting," are free to every angler. Write to-day.

Oddities & Novelties of Every-Day Science

HOW THE WORLD WILL END—Probably not within the week, but none the less surely, and by drying up, or by floods.

PROFESSOR W. H. HOLMES, Director of the United States Bureau of Ethnology, suggests two ways in which the world is more or less likely to wind up:

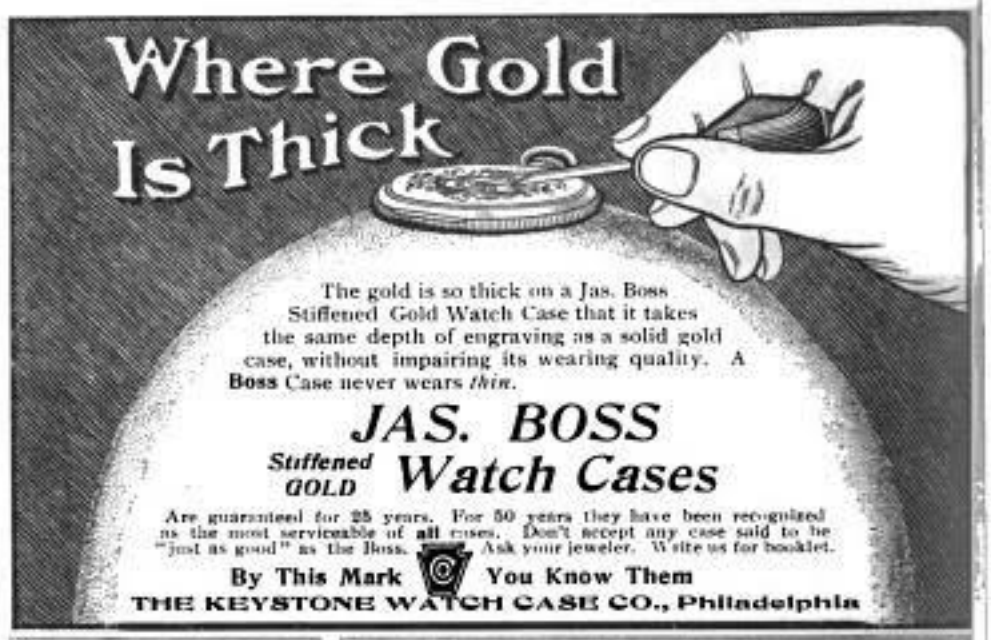
The waters on the surface of the globe, which already have been largely absorbed into the earth's crust, may sink deeper and deeper as the cooling of the interior goes on, until the outside is a desiccated desert, unfit for man or beast.

Or the waters may continue to act as they act to-day upon the land, cutting down the hills and mountains little by little, but nevertheless surely, until all the land is beneath the sea, save such artificial continents as man himself may raise.

As between these two possibilities, the former would seem to be more likely. Professor W. J. McGee says that the globe is certainly cooling and drying, much of the water being converted into solids. For example, plants consume water and convert them into solid compounds (plant tissues); but, when the plants decompose, they do not become water again.

Water is being steadily absorbed into the crust of the earth, and, owing to the progressive drying, the continents are getting bigger. On the other hand, we are learning how to utilize the available water more effectively, and some day we shall find out how to manufacture water by the electrolytic decomposition of minerals. Water is extracted every day from minerals in laboratories, and it is only a question of time, says Professor McGee, when the water for cities will be artificially made.

Though the globe is cooling, we are learning how to economize solar heat. We counterfeit the climatic conditions of the tropics by growing plants under cheesecloth, and by the use of glass we multiply the effect of the sun's rays. Where now we have hundreds of acres under glass in this country we shall have many square miles a century hence.



Thus does human ingenuity bid defiance to the cooling and drying processes that are going on. Nevertheless, as Professor Holmes remarks, there is "nothing surer than that there will come an end to the races that now are, to mankind as a whole, and to the world he inhabits." It is only a question of the manner in which this melancholy result is destined to be accomplished.

THE PAMPERED SARDINE—He promises to be soon eating American dainties—Some wonder who he really is.

UNIQUE in the American commercial invasion of Europe is the shipping of New England bait to capture sardines on the coast of Brittany.

That French sardines are unexcelled is admitted, but it is confidently predicted that American cod roe is destined to play a preeminent part in the famous fisheries of France. Along the Atlantic Coast from New Jersey northward the preparation of sardine bait from the eggs of the cod is entirely feasible, and promises very substantial increase in the revenues of cod fisheries. Moreover, America has awakened to the fact that inasmuch as cod eggs are an artificial food, they are not the only lure for sardines, and that the roe of the haddock, hake, pollock, cusk and other gadoid fishes yield a suitable bait. In fact, it is believed that all fish eggs not over one-sixteenth of an inch in diameter may ultimately be utilized.

For two hundred years Norwegian cod roe has monopolized this trade. The preference given the product from Norway has been due not so much to a superior quality of roe as to greater care in packing. American cod fishermen several years ago sought to secure a foothold in the French fish market, but unfortunately failed to bore holes in the sides of the barrels of packed roe for the escape of the brine. As a result, when the frugal sardine fishermen of Brittany unpacked the bait they encountered layers of undissolved salt, and a prejudice spread against the American product. "Salt is not good bait for sardines," was the laconic explanation of a dealer at Concarneau when questioned as to the popularity of American cod roe. Gradually, however, the product from the United States has been gaining headway, and

COOKING CONTEST

Right in the Family Kitchens

The ladies have a champion interested in the betterment of family cooks.

$7,500.00 in cash has been donated by C. W. Post, Chairman of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., to be distributed between now and July next in 735 cash prizes to stimulate family cooks to better service.

Less burned and greasy meat, and potatoes; less soggy biscuits, cake, etc., and better coffee, Postum and tea is the motto.

The girls are to compete in the preparation of good, everyday dishes and in general cookery. Probably Grape-Nuts and Postum Coffee will come in for some attention incidentally, but the tests will be conducted under the daily direction of the housewife and 735 cooks will win varying cash prizes from $100.00 down to $5.00. No one is required to pay anything whatever to enter this contest and each winner will receive a large certificate or diploma with the big Postum seal in gilt, a badge of distinction much to be sought after. Particulars can be had by addressing Cookery Dept. No. 419, of Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

now the United States Government has become interested and is prepared to give scientific suggestions and information to persons who wish to prepare bait for the French sardine industry.

In making investigations in regard to the food of sardines the American ichthyologists took up the old question as to whether sardines are a distinct species. The term sardine is a general one, applied to various clupeoid fishes of small size in many parts of the world. California, the West Indies, Chili, India, Japan and New Zealand produce sardines. These are different varieties of fish, the California sardine being nearest akin to the French.

The latter, most of the scientists agree, is the young of the pilchard.

THE PNEUMATIC CHAMBERMAID—She raises no dust, never talks back, and never asks for a night out.

ONE of the most novel of current inventions gives promise of doing much toward solving the servant problem.

This new contrivance is, in reality, a mechanical servant, portable and readily managed, which removes every particle of dust from walls, furniture, carpets, tapestries, clothing and fabrics of any kind. With this device a woman delicately gowned could clean house without herself encountering any dust.

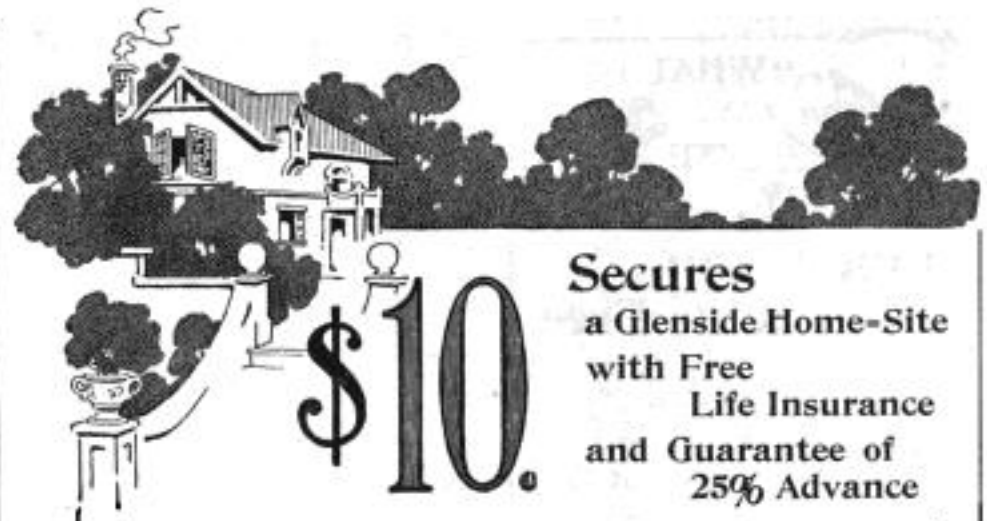
The cleaning is not effected by forcing air through a room. No dust is swirled about by the new process.

A portable engine, which may operate on the street or in the basement, is used to drive a powerful exhaust fan. From the exhaust box a hose, terminating in a nozzle of special design, runs to the dwelling or apartment where the housecleaning is to be done. At the tip of the nozzle and at right angles to it is screwed an attachment of brass or steel of any desired width, containing an aperture one-sixteenth of an inch across. To begin housecleaning the operator first turns a faucet which opens a valve and enables the vacuum below to draw air at a very rapid rate through the mouth of the nozzle terminal. By means of a long handle this metallic mouth, whose edges are round and smooth, is readily moved over any surface, whereupon a very strong suction causes every bit of dust in the path of the movement to pass through the nozzle and thence into the tube.

The dust is then drawn downward, and by a physical process is detached from the air and falls into a receptacle prepared for its lodgment.

The passing of the device once over a carpet cleans it far more effectively than a persistent beating. In the operation of the invention no dust is stirred about the room, so that but for a whirring noise caused by the inrush of air, and the exceedingly dustless area in the wake of the contrivance, there is nothing to indicate that housecleaning is in progress.

At first the cost of the housecleaning plant will limit its introduction as a fixed institution in small homes. As a permanent plant it is designed particularly for large residences, hotels and municipal and office buildings. That all classes, however, may enjoy the advantages of the system, arrangements will be made to mount the engines on automobiles and take them from street to street, sending up the connecting hose, and also an operator, if requested, to the flat or residence of any one desiring pneumatic housecleaning.



Or, if the demand for the mechanical servant warrants it, large engines will be constructed permanently in various sections of the city and rubber tubes will radiate therefrom to all houses within a given radius.

Various sizes of nozzle mouths are used. One is designed to be moved over the clothes a person is wearing. Not a vestige of dust is left behind. Through the small nozzle tip adapted for this purpose forty-two cubic inches of air are drawn every minute.

The process not only cleans a garment but freshens it, giving it the appearance of having been newly sponged and pressed.

The hygienic virtues as well as the noiselessness and the efficiency of the pneumatic chambermaid appeal to those who have witnessed experimental operations. Germ-laden dust has no chance when operated upon by this process to move about and thus spread contagion.

$10. Secures a Glenside Home-Site with Free Life Insurance and Guarantee of 25% Advance

While you are working, make your money work too. If your money is small, all the more reason why it should get to work quickly and grow big.

That is the plan on which men, who were poor a few years ago and are rich to-day, have worked and still work.

But they choose their investments carefully; and, when they have made up their minds what is good, they do it right away.

What is GLENSIDE?

The leading suburb of Philadelphia—leading already, though it is but a few years old and Philadelphia is more than two hundred years old.

Philadelphia itself is the largest manufacturing city in America. It is, besides, the city of homes, and of homes in the suburbs. Valuable as land is in the center of Philadelphia—and it has been steadily going up—the increase in value has been shared by all the good land, well-situated, around Philadelphia.

Now! Glenside is three miles from the city limits, on the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad—far enough to be out of the city's hum and noise, and to have its own pure fresh water and air—but is brought closer to Philadelphia than almost any other suburb by its enormous number of trains a day—93—and its short time to the very heart of the city—27 minutes.

This beautiful country—the most beautiful around Philadelphia—we marked a few years ago for the greatest coming suburb of Philadelphia, and indeed, in the world. Land all around it was high, and still is high; but Glenside consisted of two large estates, that could not be bought in part. They could, however, be bought as a whole at a very low price, and this we did. We spent $900,000 improving this property—perfect macadam roads, granolithic side-walks, perfect drainage, pure water, gas, electricity, trees, shrubs, gradings—and have made Glenside more than beautiful country, more than beautiful park—a perfect suburb. Hundreds of houses have sprung up on the land that, but three years ago, had only two houses.

If land was worth one price before we began, it is worth four prices now; but we don't ask you to pay what the lots are worth.

Remember that we got this land for a great deal less than it is worth, and the present price of the lots is our cost plus the cost of improvements, plus a reasonable profit for our risk and our expert knowledge.

We are the largest real estate operators in or about Philadelphia. We have opened seventy-four different properties in this very region, and have been uniformly successful. Any Philadelphia business man can tell you about us—whether we keep our word and whether we know our business.

$10 secures one of the three hundred lots set aside for the readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. The prices of lots are $200 to $1700. They are worth already a great deal more. On March 14th, a rainy Saturday, we sold $14,000 worth. On March 21st, another rainy Saturday, we sold $20,000 worth—to Philadelphia people, who know Philadelphia, and Glenside, and W. T. B. Roberts & Son. These sales were made in sections adjoining the 300 lots offered THE POST readers. Only a small proportion of the 300 lots remain unsold.

Write To-day

Send us $10 if you want to be sure of a lot. Write us anyway and let us send you all the information, that you may judge for yourself. The above is, of course, not the whole story.

Upon Receipt of $10.00

we will reserve you one of these lots and send you a marked plan showing its location. We shall pick out for you the best unsold lot; but if, for any reason, you desire any other, we are glad to make the change. If you come to Glenside we will pay a proportionate part of your expenses, according to the size of your investment.

25% Increase Guaranteed

We guarantee hereby, and will guarantee with your deed of sale, that the property will increase in value 25 per cent. within a year from purchase, based on prices at which the ground is then selling. If it fails to do this, we will refund your money at the end of twelve months with six per cent. interest added.

Free Life Insurance

If you die without completing the payments on your lot, the lot will be deeded to your heirs without any further payments being made to us.

Despotism and Democracy

women brought back to him something of his lost love. He knew she had never married, but all else concerning her was a blank to him. He was consumed with a desire to ask Crane something about her—all about her—but he had noted instantly that in Crane's eye and voice was a manner which revealed a dangerous interest in Constance Maitland; and so Thorndyke was held back and urged forward to speak of her.

The band passed on, the street once more grew quiet, and Crane returned to his seat. Thorndyke smoked savagely to keep from mentioning Constance Maitland's name. Crane did likewise, but having less self-control than Thorndyke he could not but hark back to the ticklish subject.

"So you say you knew Miss Maitland?"

"Yes. A long time ago."

"She's very old-fashioned—enough so to stay out of society when she is wearing mourning. She's been in mourning for her uncle by marriage ever since she's been in Washington—six months. The exclusives don't stay in mourning more than six months for husbands, wives or children. Parents and aunts and uncles don't count."

"The exclusives don't have any aunts and uncles," Thorndyke put in shortly. "They have nieces and nephews who are presentable after they have been washed and combed—but they can't go back as far as uncles and aunts."

"So they can't. Their uncles and aunts are just like my uncles and aunts. Well, I gather that the old Count for whom Miss Maitland has worn mourning wasn't a bad old party—better, perhaps, than his American wife."

"He was," said Thorndyke.

Crane looked at him suspiciously and then kept on.

"Miss Maitland is going out this spring. She says I'm quite right in thinking there is a delightful society attainable here in Washington, but she's so pleased to be back in her own country that she praises everything right and left. To see her flow of spirits you would think her the happiest woman in the world. Yet she told me once that she wasn't really happy."

"All women tell you that before you get through with them," growled Thorndyke.

"Annette never has," said Crane, rising and throwing away his cigar. "Some time, if you wish to call on Miss Maitland, I'll take you round."

Thorndyke restrained the temptation to brain Crane with the carafe on the table by him, partly out of regard for himself, partly out of regard to Crane.

"And as for my streak of luck, as you call it," Crane continued, "I intend to devote all my powers to my work, so that no matter what other committee makes a fool of itself, the Committee on Foreign Relations won't—at least through its chairman," Crane continued.

"It's easy enough to steer that committee when everything is peaceful," answered Thorndyke, meaning to take the new chairman down a peg. "And it's a great deal easier when we get into a continental mess as we are now. Wait until you get on the Ways and Means, or Committee on Elections, or Banking and Currency, if you want to have a little Gehenna of your own on earth. Good-night."

Thorndyke sat up smoking until after two o'clock. His thoughts were not concerned with Crane's political future, nor with his own either, nor with the continental mess. He was thinking about that dead and gone time, and how far away it was; the moderns did not make love through the medium of sentimental songs to the guitar and to stanzas from Childe Harold. They preferred ragtime on the mandolin, and the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám; and they no longer seemed to fall in love in the painful and whole-souled manner which had befallen him; and then he wandered off into thinking how a man's will could go so far and no farther, and how he should feel when he saw Constance Maitland, as he must eventually, and how she would look and speak. He concluded, before he went to bed, that he had experienced that unlucky accident, the breaking of heart, which would not mend, do what he could; for he was one of those rare and unfortunate men who can love but once.

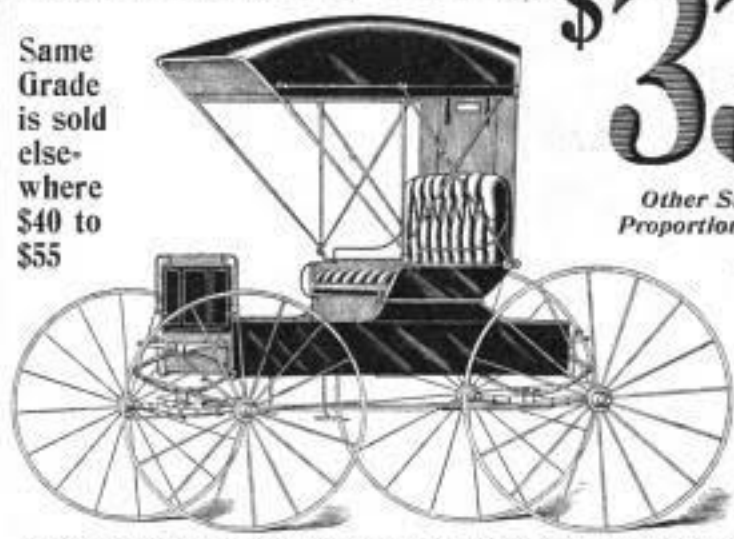
A Ballade of the Girl from Jersey City

By Carolyn Wells

Of many maidens men have sung,
  Full oft their trumpets blare,
For Philadelphia maidens young—
  New York girls debonnaire;
  But, though the Boston girl is rare,
The Southern girl is pretty;
  Of one none seems to be aware—
The Girl from Jersey City.

Though she may have a clever tongue,
  Dark eyes and golden hair,
Praise from the poets can't be rung—
  They neither know nor care
  Whether her name's Claudine or Clare,
Whether she's dull or witty,
  Whether she's robust, slim or spare—
The Girl from Jersey City.

From noble lines she may have sprung;
  To large estates be heir;
To fine traditions may have clung,
  And a great name may bear;
  Yet none to her his faith will swear,
None praise in song or ditty;
  No one is brave enough to dare
The Girl from Jersey City.



L'Envoi

Muses, it's none of my affair,
  And yet it seems a pity
To see her pining lonely there—
  The Girl from Jersey City.

2nd March 1903.

Mr. N. V. Goodrich,

South Hanover, Mass.

Dear Mr. Goodrich:-

Not a small part of the pleasure derived from our recent trip to the Majestic Mines, Utah, is the friendships which we formed with the several members of our party. I am a great believer in the educational results produced by a trip abroad, that is--away from one's home locality, either in our own country or across the water. That which we see with our own eyes, and that which we hear by rubbing elbows with our fellows, always makes a lasting impression.

There were many episodes of our trip which we may recall with pleasure, but the solid satisfaction comes from the information and knowledge which it afforded along the lines of mining industry.

The three important requisites to the success of such a proposition as the Majestic, have been made very apparent to us, namely:-

(1) Ore in substantial quantity and quality.
(2) The necessary facilities for its conversion into a saleable product, having a market value.
(3) A management, at once honest and capable, having the welfare of all its stockholders at heart.

To me it is a source of pleasing gratification that the very excellent showing of Majestic proposition makes clear to my mind these requisites as indispensably necessary, while at the same time meeting each one fully and completely.

As to the first--our visit to the Vicksburg, Old Hickory and O. K., not to speak of the other mines, was a convincing argument. In regard to the facilities for conversion of this mountain ore into ready cash, the progress already made toward smeltering, and the adaptation of general situation of things easy and least expensive means and appliances necessary, meets this requirement.

Lastly, but yet vastly important, comes the question of efficient management guaranteed to turn a deaf ear to all scheming, and making the welfare of the stockholders its first and only consideration. In this last respect, I am glad to note that the present and so far as can see the future outlook for the Majestic is all that could be desired. After persistent and diligent inquiry made touching the good name and reputation of each and every of the officers and directors of Majestic, I have yet to hear the first word casting the shadow of a doubt upon the fitness of any of them.

And now, Mr. Goodrich, I have written to you at greater length than I intended, but the truth is that I have seen and heard so much of Majestic proposition that I feel in my bones it should and will succeed. However, notwithstanding my enthusiasm in this regard, on my own account, I have not lost the feeling of responsibility which one assumes in presenting an enterprise, however good it may appear, to others. At one time I felt that while I might risk an investment on my own account, I could not think of presenting it to a friend or client. The lines of investment to which I have been accustomed in the last quarter of a century have not been of this character. But I have overcome this feeling somewhat. The facts which have come to me have so thoroughly assured me that this is an investment pure and simple, with a most promising future, and the element of risk well nigh eliminated, that I have felt constrained to present the facts to certain friends, leaving them to determine from these facts, and without advice from me, whether or not they should go into it.

Thus far I have so presented the proposition to three friends, with the result that each one of them has expressed a desire to make the investment. As an earnest of my good intentions, I am trebling my holdings.

I trust you arrived home in good condition and that you are now enjoying the benefits of the trip in an increased measure of physical and mental vigor.

Very truly yours,

Dic. J. W. A.

The Awakening of George Raymond

He read and re-read it until the type grew blurred. What did it mean? He asked himself that a thousand times. What did it mean? He sought his room and locked the door, striding up and down with agitation, the cablegram clenched in his hand. He was beside himself, triumphant, and yet in a fever of misgiving. Was it not perhaps a coincidence, not an answer to his own letter, but one of those extraordinary instances of what is called telepathy?

Her words would bear either interpretation. Possibly the whole family was returning with her. Possibly she had never seen his letter at all. Possibly it was following her back to America, unopened and undelivered.

"Sailing by Touraine, arriving sixth." Was that an answer? Perhaps indeed it was. Perhaps it was a woman's way of saying yes; it might even be, in her surpassing kindness, that she was coming to break her refusal as gently as she might, too considerate of his feelings to write it baldly on paper. At least, amid all these doubts, it assured him of one thing, her regard; that he was not forgotten; that he had been mistaken in thinking himself ignored.

He spent the next eight days in a cruel and heart-breaking suspense. He could hardly eat or sleep. He grew thin, and started at a sound. He paid a dollar to have the Touraine's arrival telegraphed to the office; another dollar to have it telegraphed to the boarding-house; he was fearful that one or the other might miscarry, and repeatedly warned the landlady of a possible message for him in the middle of the night.

"It means a great deal to me," he said. "It means everything to me. I don't know what I'd do if I missed the Touraine!"

Of course he did not miss the Touraine. He was on the wharf hours before her coming. He exasperated every one with his questions. He was turned out of all kinds of barriers; he earned the distrust of the detectives; he became a marked man. He was certainly there for no good, that tall guy in the slouch hat, his lean hands fidgeting for a surreptitious pearl necklace or an innocent-looking umbrella full of diamonds—one who, in their language, was a geezer that would bear watching.

The steamer came alongside, and Raymond gazed up at the tier upon tier of faces. At length, with a catch at his heart, he caught sight of Miss Latimer, who smiled and waved her hand to him. He scanned her narrowly for an answer to his doubts; and these increased the more he gazed at her. It seemed a bad sign to see her so calm, so composed; worse still to behold her occasionally in animated conversation with some of her fellow-passengers. He thought her smiles had even a perfunctory friendliness, and he had to share them besides with others. It was plain she had never received his letter. No woman could bear herself like that who had received such a letter. Then, too, she appeared so handsome, so high-bred, so charming and noticeable a figure in the little company about her that Raymond felt a crushing sense of his own humbleness, and of the impassable void between them. How had he ever dared aspire to this beautiful woman!—and the thought of his effrontery took him by the throat.

He stood at the gangway as the passengers came off, an interminable throng, slow-moving, teetering on the slats, a gush of funneled humanity, hampered and hampering, with bags, hat-boxes, rolls of rugs, dressing-cases, golf-sticks and children. At last Miss Latimer was carried into the eddy, her maid behind her laden with her things, lost to view save by the bright feather in her traveling hat. The seconds were like hours as Raymond waited. He had a peep of her, smiling and patient, talking over her shoulder to a big Englishman behind her. Then, as the human stream brought her down, she stepped lightly on the wharf, turned to Raymond, and before he could so much as stammer out a word, flung her arms round his neck and kissed him.

"Did you really want me?" she said. And then, "You gave me but two hours to catch the old Touraine!"

(THE END)

Why Ad. Writing Builds Great Businesses

Incomes from $100 to $500 a Month through Mail Instruction.

By GEORGE H. POWELL

I AM going to say something to the business men readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST regarding the marvelous possibilities of the right sort of advertising, because of the great interest manifested in this modern science from coast to coast.

The recent article in this magazine by Paul Latzke, entitled "Freaks and Fortunes in Advertising," was a fairly correct statement of conditions, particularly that portion which drew the deduction that advertising is a much better investment than a gold mine.

Never were truer words written, and yet the business world has hardly begun to realize results which have been responsible for millions of dollars in profits and dividends through modern publicity.

One reads about some bright man who has made a fortune advertising a specialty, and the mental impression is that it was, after all, some lucky accident, or freak, that may not again occur in twenty years—all because natural conditions are not understood or comprehended.

We hear of a "schemer" who began advertising for mail orders and getting rich within a very short time—and again the average mind is prone to attribute success to some fortunate combination of circumstances, rather than to the proper cause.

A few years ago a man sent out by express to hundreds of fictitious names gold-plated watches, accompanied by bills at about $15.00 each, with credits averaging $5.00 each, giving the impression that this was cash payment. When notified later by the express agents that the goods remained uncalled for, each agent was told to allow any one to pay balance and receive the full receipted bill. Thousands of dollars were realized, simply because a good many agents possessed enough Yankee in their make-ups to induce them to grasp the "bargains."

While cases of this sort have been numerous in times past, yet advertising has reached a higher plane and more legitimate methods are now known to be not only the most profitable, but what is better—lasting. It is worthy of note that the very man who worked the express agents is to-day the head of one of America's greatest mail order houses doing an annual business reaching into millions. $500,000.00 is probably a small estimate of the money he has spent for advertising articles of highest merit at genuine bargain prices.

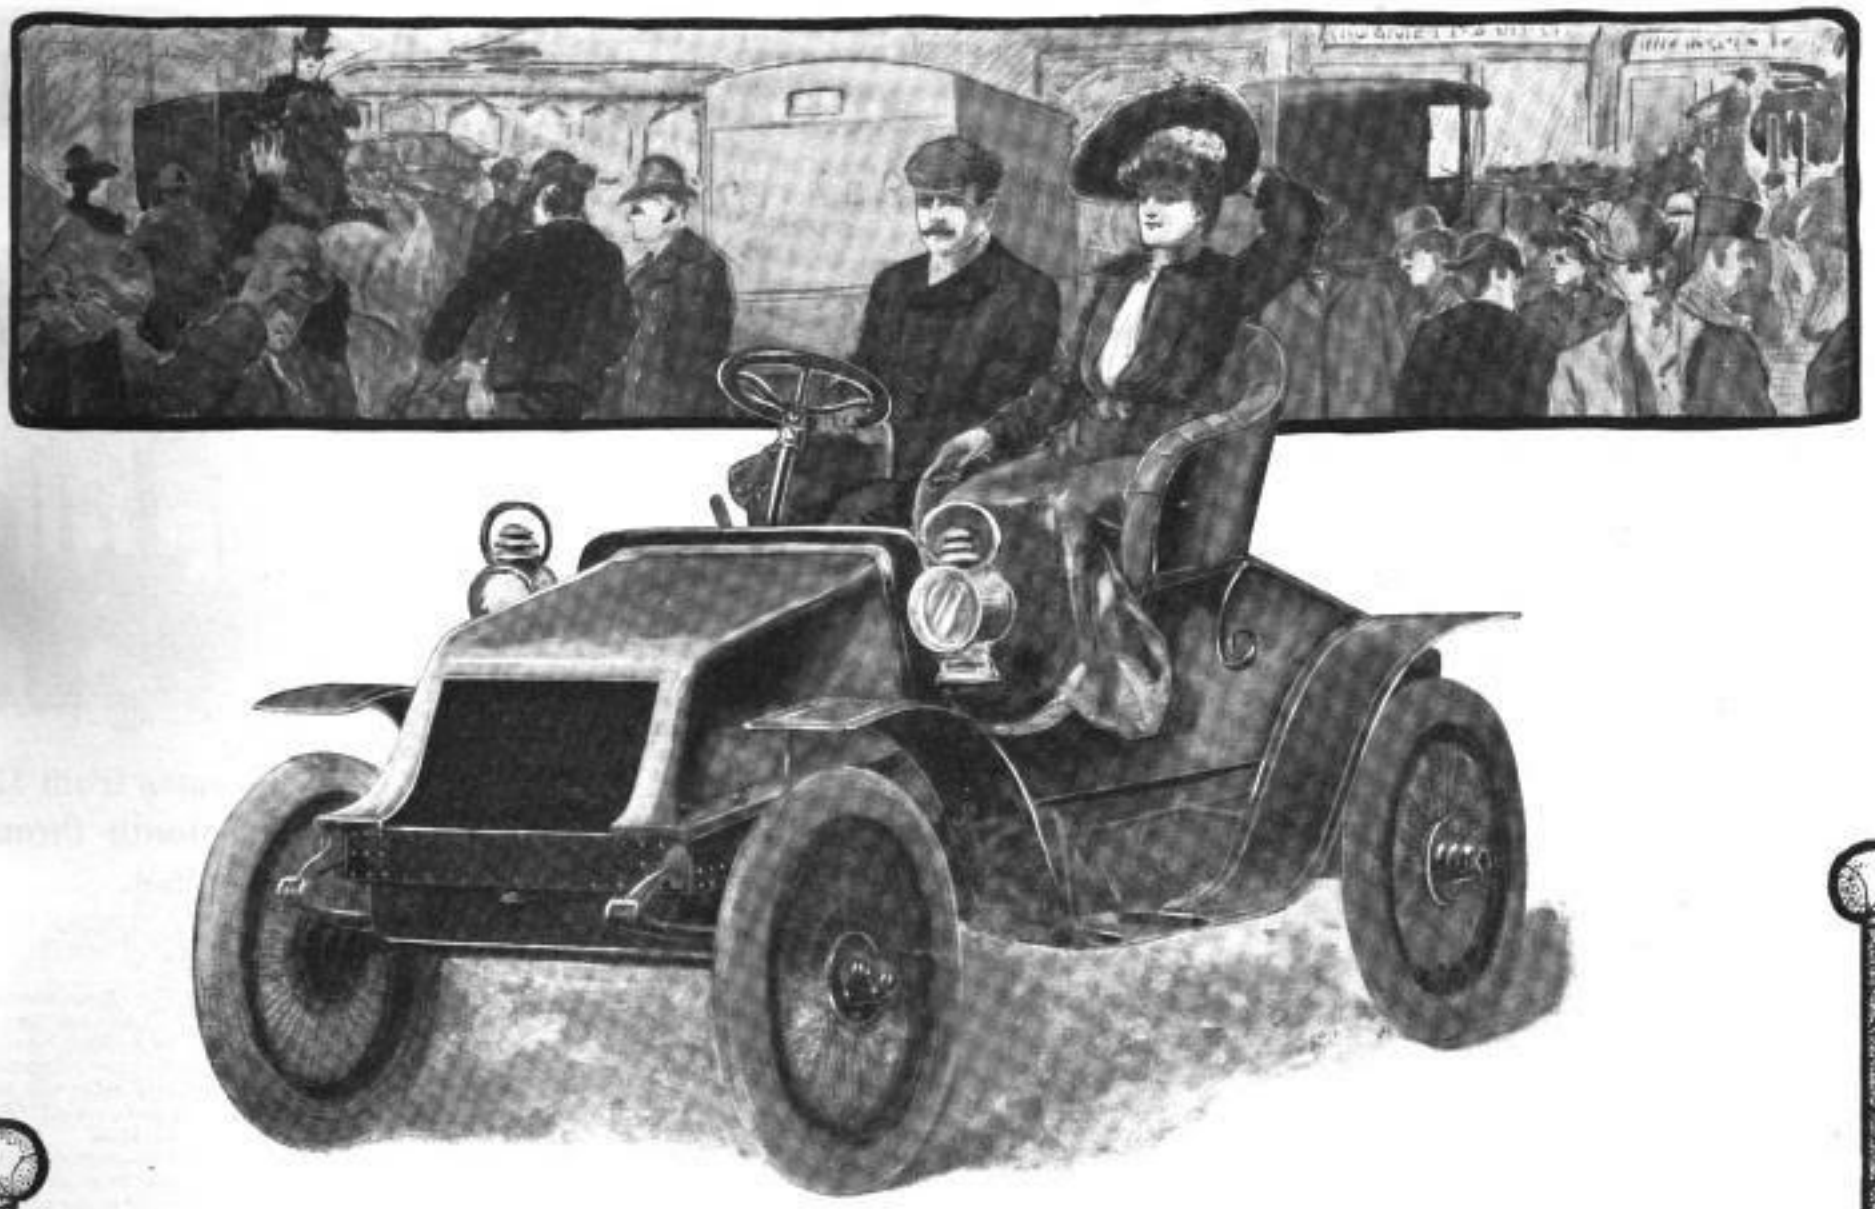
My success as a teacher of advertising is due in no small degree to my fortunate experience in business promotion, and while I teach the young man or woman the art of writing and originating catchy, snappy advertising, so he or she can earn from $100.00 to $500.00 a month, yet this is only a part of my present work.

As conditions exist to-day, with an ever-increasing demand for competent advertising writers, and with an unsupplied call from business men, especially in the smaller places, it is obvious that some provision must be made whereby these merchants and manufacturers can themselves acquire that skill now so essential for making every dollar spent for advertising count heavily. Competition demands better methods, better advertising ideas and copy, and better—results. More than that, the unploughed advertising field is as boundless as the ocean, and proper instruction will enable any aggressive business man to create fortunes in new, as well as in the old, lines.

It matters not whether one wishes to create a demand among retail stores, or to secure trade direct by mail, my system of instruction has been proven the salvation of more than one business. Not only do I teach the art of preparing advertising, but by examination of each requirement I am able to recommend improvements that may be vital to the existence of the business, apart from the advertising itself.

The advertiser who has but a small amount of money to begin with usually finds my advice worth several times the cost of my course of instruction. To quote a well-known mail order advertiser, who has an established and profitable business in Far Rockaway, N. Y.: "The Powell System of Advertising Instruction was worth more than its cost in one letter of detailed advice, to say nothing about the splendid instructions in ad-writing."

Well might he thus value my help, since I told him a new way to secure thousands of agents throughout the country at least expense.



Of course, students who are not in business for themselves are given special plans for promotion, if they wish them, the object being to perfect the student and make him or her a skillful advertising manager and writer.

While clear-cut, original advertisements are a crying need, yet business methods which act in harmony are also vitally essential. A number of years ago I accomplished what was at the time considered impossible—the establishment of a proprietary medicine business, on a profit-making basis, within one month. With well matured plans and $500.00 cash for advertising I sold the retail drug trade of Rhode Island over $1,700.00 net in three weeks, the bills for advertising actually footing up less than $400.00, and this great success was repeated city by city throughout New England. And when I state that it was all done during the first Bryan presidential campaign, when jobbers bought as gingerly as possible, and at a time when supposedly wise advertisers were using small space, the achievement in question appears doubly impressive. And yet I was merely utilizing known principles, plus particularly good advertisements. The "wise" advertisers who were scared into small space, or none at all, will always have my profoundest gratitude.

I merely mention this latter case to illustrate the value of daring in advertising. To coldly analyze each proposition and then strike hard at the opportune moment is important.

To all business men, as well as to all young men and women, who wish to make larger incomes, I shall be glad to mail my beautiful new prospectus, the most interesting work of its kind ever published. Merely address me George H. Powell, 185 Temple Court, New York, N. Y.

Through all the Crush with Perfect Ease

An accomplishment possible only in an automobile so simple and sensitive, in its control and steering mechanism, that it responds like a living thing to the driver's wishes. That automobile is the

Winton

Absolute control of the car is assured by the Winton method of motor government which is simplicity itself. A little spring button under the driver's right foot operates the air governor, which controls the speed of the motor. When the pressure upon this button is increased the motor speeds up and the car forges ahead. Release the pressure, the motor slows down and the car speed diminishes. You get any desired variation by the use of this throttle button. The method is so simple and effective that the driver increases or decreases speed of car without conscious effort. There is no automobile manufactured or sold in America which combines so many features of real excellence. The Winton is a practical result of long experience thoroughly tried out. It is of clever design, beautifully finished, and the entire correctness of our horizontal, double opposed cylinder motor is being demonstrated daily to the complete satisfaction of the very best mechanical minds.

The price of this superb 20 horse power car complete with detachable tonneau, full brass side lamps, tools, etc., is $2500.00.

Visit any of our branch or agency depots and the features of Winton excellence will be demonstrated.

Freedom from sickness is not perfect health, as I understand it

I hate a liar. The man who has not the moral courage to face the truth about his physical and mental condition is just as repugnant to me as he who deliberately lies about his neighbor. Self deception is the worst form of falsehood.

This world is full of people who are afraid to examine into their real condition, or who are simply thoughtless and do not realize that they are not in perfect health, simply because they are not violently ill.

Take yourself, for instance.

Sit down and honestly face the facts of your real condition. Soberly and sensibly stop a moment and think. Are you as well as you might be?

Is your flesh firm and sound? Is your digestion perfect? Do you have to assist nature by recourse to salts and medicines? Are your eyes bright, and does your skin bear the rosy flush of perfect health? Are your nerves steady? Do you sleep well, and is your appetite that of healthy childhood? Is your blood pure and warm, and does each day's duty find you perfectly equipped for the fray?

These are only a few of the questions which you ought to ask yourself.

Comparative health is nothing more nor less than a mild form of illness.

I offer you superior health. I propose to aid you in securing that freedom from bodily ailments; that buoyancy of spirit; that bounding vitality which will banish worry and care and rob the exacting duties of life of their terrors.

I offer you strength and symmetry of body, grace and ease of carriage, and a strong, healthy brain and nervous system, unclouded by disease or weakness.

When I tell that my system replaces lassitude with energy, weakness with strength, stooped shoulders and a shuffling gait with dignity and ease of carriage; when I assert that my system gives sound, refreshing, dreamless sleep, reduces obesity and eradicates dyspepsia, and keeps every organ of your body up to nature's perfect standard, I am perfectly well aware that I am making big claims.

Measure me by my works, not by my words.

I offer the unprejudiced testimony, not of people so obscure that their word is valueless, but of men and women whose standing in the social and business world is such that they are above the breath of suspicion.

MR. ALOIS P. SWOBODA, Chicago, Illinois. Baltimore, February 11, 1903

DEAR SIR: Being fully aware that physical exercise is essential to the well-being of man, I have at all times taken good care to exercise my muscles sufficiently well. The result of it is that now at the age of 57 years I can tire out many a companion of half my age either in walking or wheeling, that I can be in the saddle for half a day without inconvenience and that I am in good physical condition all around. It was, therefore, simply an experiment when I placed myself under your care, and indeed I looked rather skeptically at the results to follow, but having now faithfully carried out your instructions for three months, I unhesitatingly say that I never before derived so much benefit from any other kind of exercise requiring the same length of time. Indeed the great advantage of your exercise is that one derives more benefit from the thirty minutes devoted to it daily than by spending several hours on other kinds of exercise. I sincerely hope that you may meet with the success that you so fully deserve.

Yours very truly, (Signed) W. SIMON, Ph. D., Professor of Chemistry in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Baltimore.

My system is as elastic as human need. I have no set rules — no ironclad methods of procedure. My instruction to you will be measured and guided by your necessity. It will be just as individual as though you were my only pupil.

I shall be pleased to send you free valuable information and detailed outline of my system, its principles and effects, upon application. This information which I furnish free is very interesting and cannot be secured elsewhere at any price. Write at once.

SAN REMO

I DOUBT if in modern times, or perhaps even in the past, a greater, more impressive, more really affectingly tragic episode has ever taken place than that of which the marvelous region of the Côte d'Azur, by the shore of the eternally blue Mediterranean, was the theatre during the winter of 1887–1888.

On the frontier which separates France and Italy, in the delicious little town of San Remo, among the palms and the orange trees in blossom, there in the sunlight and the fragrance which bathed the white city, a man whom suffering had vanquished was slowly dying. He was the son of the old Emperor, William I, the son-in-law of Queen Victoria. I refer to the Crown Prince Frederick William.

The whole world had its eyes fixed on this town and on this man. With anxious curiosity the whole world was watching the frightful struggle there being conducted in order to prolong the life of this doomed heir to a throne. Would he live long enough to become one day Emperor? Would he have the strength to traverse finally the little space separating him from one of the greatest thrones on earth? Who would be the first to die, the old Emperor, enfeebled by age, or the Crown Prince, enfeebled by sickness? Who first would be the King, the Crown Prince Frederick, or the young man, ardent, impetuous and impatient, known as Prince William? All about the planet these were the questions that people were asking themselves, and for which they were awaiting a reply.

San Remo had been, so to say, taken by storm by reporters from every country, immediately upon the arrival there of the Crown Prince. Opposite the Prince's villa was a hotel, the Hotel de la Méditerranée. People almost came to blows to secure a front room there. Certain American papers had sent out young ladies as reporters, counting on the fact of their sex to procure them certain privileges. These ladies, from morning to night, kept leveling their photographic apparatus at the villa, the garden, and above all, at the balcony where, in the afternoon, Frederick William was wont to come to cradle his suffering in the somewhat distant murmur of the sea. To protect him against this inquisitorial indiscretion a high wall of verdure had been constructed, and on the balcony had been placed a screen. But this was all so much time and trouble thrown away. The reporters, men and women alike, ascended to the roof of the hotel, and from that vantage point, plunging their vision beyond both screen and wall of verdure, photographed and gazed and listened to their hearts' content. . . .

Yet they obtained little enough. No one, at all events, had the slightest inkling of what was taking place in the interior of the villa, whither no outsider had been allowed to penetrate. The occupants—orderlies, doctors, dames d'honneur, servants, were all of an extraordinary discretion. Not the slightest echo escaped by the windows; not the slightest piece of gossip issued by the door. Reporters and journalists remained in an ignorance anything but blissful, and telegraphed nothing of importance. As one of them, a Frenchman, said:

"So little is known as to what is going on about the Crown Prince that it is impossible even to embroider [sic] and to give play to one's imagination."

I myself, happening to be at Monte Carlo, had gone over to San Remo, and had striven to penetrate a little the mystery, to raise a corner of the veil, to bring back a few echoes of the tragedy which was evidently taking place, which I felt certainly was going on, behind the walls of verdure. But I had completely failed and had left San Remo disappointed, irritated, but haunted by the image of this villa, picturesquely suspended in its garden of verdure, but tantalizingly mute and enigmatic as a sphinx.

—I FOUND AMONG MY LETTERS A MAUVE ENVELOPE

One morning in the first week in March, 1888, I found, however, among my letters a mauve envelope. I recall vividly even now its very form and color. The letter was in a large and fine feminine hand. It contained only four lines, as follows:

"If you wish to know the tragedy of San Remo, why do you not try to find Madame Zirio?"

More than once—let me say this here—more than once during my long and adventurous existence I have received just such mysterious and anonymous suggestions. They were not always written on mauve letter-paper, and they did not always emanate from a feminine hand; but according to my mood at the moment, according to the feeling of presentiment which agitated my soul, according to the sensations aroused in me by them at the time, I either flung them into the waste-basket or religiously heeded their contents. And when I had adopted the latter resolution I uniformly did not regret it.

I recalled quite well the name of Madame Zirio, whom I had met once in the South of France. She was a tall, handsome woman, with bright, honest eyes, brilliant black hair—in which she often wore, like the women of Catalonia, a large fantastic comb—with a delicate yet energetic mouth, and in general an air due to her Marseillaise extraction, which betrayed the suppleness of the Phocians and the wavy motion of the Greeks. She was married to an Italian who was always ill, M. Baptiste Zirio, and I was unable to make out what possible connection there could be between her and the dying heir of the German Empire. Yet I felt a presentiment bidding me "Go!" and I went. In a word, that very evening I packed my bag and boarded the Mediterranean Express for San Remo.

—RELATED TO ME WHAT WAS CALLED "THE TRAGEDY OF SAN REMO"

Once there I discovered without difficulty the little house occupied by Madame Zirio. I rang the doorbell, was ushered in, and it was only after I found myself seated in this lady's drawing-room that the whole humor of the situation came over me, and I asked myself how I was going to explain my position to my hostess.

I concluded that the simplest means were the best, and when Madame Zirio appeared and we had exchanged the preliminary compliments, I merely showed her the mauve letter.

She blushed a little, then became pale. "It is really strange," said she. "I, too, received a letter yesterday almost identical with this one. The handwriting was very like this and the color of the paper was the same. Mine also contained four lines: 'If you receive the visit of a celebrated journalist, why not tell him the truth of the tragedy of San Remo?'"

The coincidence was, to say the least, odd. I hasten to add that the mysterious person who had sent these two letters knew certainly what she was about, for Madame Zirio, whose name hitherto had been pronounced by no one in the world, whose very existence was unsuspected by any journalist, was in reality the proprietor of the white villa occupied by the Crown Prince Frederick. It was she who had presided over all the preparations; she who, having only five weeks allotted her, had engaged and trained the admirably discreet personnel, from whom no one at San Remo had been able to extract the slightest information; she who had daily access to the interior of the princely habitation; she who was consulted hourly, by night as well as by day, as to what had to be done; she to whom Prince William had paid a visit during his forty-eight hours' stay at San Remo, and to whom even, in token of his gratitude and friendship, he had offered his photograph with a dedication.

Madame Zirio herself had arranged the apartments. The ground floor was set apart as a general drawing-room and dining-room. The first floor was occupied by the Crown Prince and his wife. A large bedroom, with two small beds exactly alike, communicated by a large dressing-room and by a small corridor with the apartment of the dame d'honneur, the Countess of Brüchl.

On the second floor were the apartments of the Princesses—Princess Victoria, then fiancée to Prince Alexander of Battenberg, and who, displaying her hands which were interminably long, said with a laugh, in French: "Moi, j'ai des Hohenzollern les mains, les pieds et les oreilles; c'est énorme!" and Princess Sophie, who on the eve of her return to Berlin said: "I am pleased to leave, for I was almost forgetting here that I am a Royal Princess."

Indeed, the house had so delighted the Crown Prince that when he first entered it, lifting almost joyously his traveling-cap and flinging off the long brown ulster, he said to Madame Zirio: "I am touched by the attentive way in which our stay here has been arranged. You feel that it is a woman's eye, and the eye of a woman of this Côte d'Azur, which must have presided over everything."

. . . And, seated there in Madame Zirio's drawing-room, only a few steps from the white villa and near the blue sea, my hostess, following the best of the mysterious letter on the mauve paper, related to me what was called "The Tragedy of San Remo."

It was, indeed, a veritable tragedy, and behind the peaceful walls of the sunlit house there were some terrible struggles, certain frightful rivalries. The sick man had brought with him German doctors, among whom was Professor Bergmann, and English doctors, notably Sir Morell Mackenzie; and between these doctors the struggle was almost dramatic in its intensity. At the outset the Germans held their peace, relatively speaking; but later they expressed their opinions on Sir Morell Mackenzie with a brutal want of self-control, even going so far as to say that he furnished information to the press, and that, on this information, he speculated on the Bourse. The personnel was entirely German or English, and reflected the dissensions of the doctors. Count von Seckendorff, who had taken up his abode in a dark room, without sun, on the ground floor, was the inflexible partisan of the Royal Princess, while Count Radolinski took the German side.

Between the two parties there was not one single moment of truce. The struggle was sombre and silent, but it was visible on any and every occasion. The two camps attacked each other bitterly. When the moment arrived to perform the operation of tracheotomy, the wretched battle continued even around the tube which was to prolong the agony of Frederick III. The German doctors wanted a German tube; the English doctors an English one. Finally, under the direction of the famous American, Dr. Thomas Evans, a goldsmith constructed the model which was adopted.

On November 9, 1887, at 6:30 P. M., another element of tragedy came to heighten the dramatic character of the situation. Prince William of Prussia arrived at San Remo. The local authorities, his brother, Prince Henry, and the aides-de-camp awaited him. With that spontaneity characteristic of him, Prince Henry ran to meet his elder brother, in order to fling himself into his arms. Prince William interrupted this brotherly movement with a haughtiness that was remarked. His features wore a look of gravity, measured and hierarchic. The smiles vanished from the faces of the lookers-on and heavier fell the veil of sadness.

During the forty-eight hours of his stay Prince William saw his father very little, or perhaps not at all. But he had long talks with the German doctors, displaying toward the English doctors either disdain or utter indifference.

"My mother," said he textually, "is really very short-sighted in substituting English science for German science, which Bismarck, who never makes a mistake, considers superior to all the others."

He made also with his brother and sisters a few excursions on the sea, spending the afternoon thus, and displaying real gayety, as if he had nothing whatever on his mind.

"Voyez-vous," said he, "it is better to have only boys, for when you have a girl it becomes immediately much more embarrassing and a good deal more expensive. You immediately have to have a governess, a dame d'honneur, and a whole complicated household. Whereas with boys you can dress them all alike in uniform. A single piece of stuff serves for them all."

On the very morrow of his arrival Prince William announced his departure.

"Ah, all the better," said Madame Zirio, who chanced to be there. "For the Crown Prince is better, and the last consultation was reassuring. . . ."

"Oh, no," replied Prince William, "on the contrary, my father, as was foreseen when I left Berlin, is given up. He is suffering, without the slightest doubt, from cancer. It's a matter of only a certain number of days, perhaps of weeks. I am going, because in staying on there is no longer anything to hope for. My grandfather is much enfeebled. The Czar is coming, and my presence at Berlin is indispensable. I think I shall still have time to return here."

There were a few moments of silence when Madame Zirio said laughingly:

"Will you allow me to say Au revoir, Emperor to be?"

"Willingly," replied the Prince, and he took leave.

On the morrow he quitted San Remo for Berlin, absolutely convinced that his father's case was hopeless.

On February 7, 1888—just four weeks before I myself arrived at San Remo—at eleven A. M., the Crown Prince and his wife took an open carriage for a drive on the Corniche. Doctor Mackenzie and Doctor Bramann, Doctor Bergmann's assistant, were at the door of the villa awaiting the departure of the carriage. Just as the driver was about to give the rein to his impatient horses a breeze sprang up on the coast. Mackenzie made a sign to the driver, who pulled back his team.

He came up to Bramann. The Prince, with a sad look in his eyes, turned his head toward them.

THE EMPEROR WROTE FOR HIM
A FEW WORDS OF THANKS

"This promenade is imprudent," said Doctor Mackenzie to Doctor Bramann. "The respiration is becoming difficult. Within two hours it will perhaps be too late and Bergmann will not be here before two days. We must come to a decision."

"Never," replied Doctor Bramann, "shall I have the courage to assume the responsibility of this operation."

And the Prince, who kept looking at them both, saw that Bramann was becoming pale.

"At all events," replied Mackenzie, "before letting him go out we must make a fresh examination."

And he made to the future Emperor an affectionate sign to invite him to get out of the carriage.

The Crown Prince flung off the furs that covered his knees, and, turning toward the Princess as if to ask her to pardon him for having spoiled her outing, stepped down, and entered the house. The doctors then examined once more the throat.

"I will wait an hour," said Doctor Mackenzie. "If there is no change you will operate."

An iron bedstead was sent for, and the head-rail was broken so that the doctors should not be embarrassed. The bed was placed in the middle of the room, a red cushion was placed on the pillows and they waited.

At one o'clock there was a fresh examination.

Doctor Mackenzie, after a rapid glance, merely turned to Doctor Bramann and said:

"Are you ready?"

"Yes," was the latter's reply.

The Prince lay down on the little iron bed. He was calm.

"Is chloroform indispensable?" he asked.

"Yes, Prince," replied the doctors. The anæsthetic then began its work. The operation began. . . .

Two hours later it was over and the Crown Princess Frederick, entering the apartment of her dame d'honneur, the Countess of Brüchl, exclaimed with sobs:

"Fritz has the tube in his throat."

All this, I need hardly say, is history, and even now as I am writing these lines for my American readers I recall vividly the scene there at San Remo, when Madame Zirio related to me, as the shadows fell, the whole story of this tragedy in which she herself had been so absorbed a spectator.

This interview, as I have said, occurred on March 8, 1888. I sat there drinking in every word that fell from the lips of my interlocutrice, fixing them faithfully in my memory, when a coup de théâtre, more unexpected still, took place.

The drawing-room door was suddenly burst open and a servant appeared, quite out of breath, on the sill.

"Madame, Madame," she cried, "you don't know the news?"

"No, what is it?"

"It has just come from the White Villa. It appears that the old Emperor has just died at Berlin."

A moment later we were on our way to the White Villa.

In the garden of the Crown Prince a pall of sorrow seemed to hang like an atmosphere. Officers, major-domos, sentinels and servants were hurrying hither and thither in strange confusion. The large downstairs drawing-room was brilliantly lighted and through the windows we beheld the scene as if we were at the play.

The household had assembled there and was ranged in a circle. The talk was in undertones. All seemed to feel the strangeness, the really stupefying character of the sudden elevation of the Prince, whose death already had been discounted and deplored.

Suddenly the door opened and the "Emperor" appeared.

He had become handsome again as in the radiant days of his youth. His beard, with a few silver streaks, glowed in the brilliant light of the chandelier. Tall and well built, he dominated the entire company. His blue eyes were slightly veiled. His delicate complexion, now heightened with a little color, seemed to show the real tranquillity which now invaded his soul, and his mouth fell into that seductive smile which characterized him.

With a firm step he walked straight to a small table in the middle of the drawing-room and wrote—for the tube prevented him from speaking—a few lines which he signed. An officer read out the paper aloud. It was the announcement of the death of the Emperor William I and of his own accession as Frederick III.

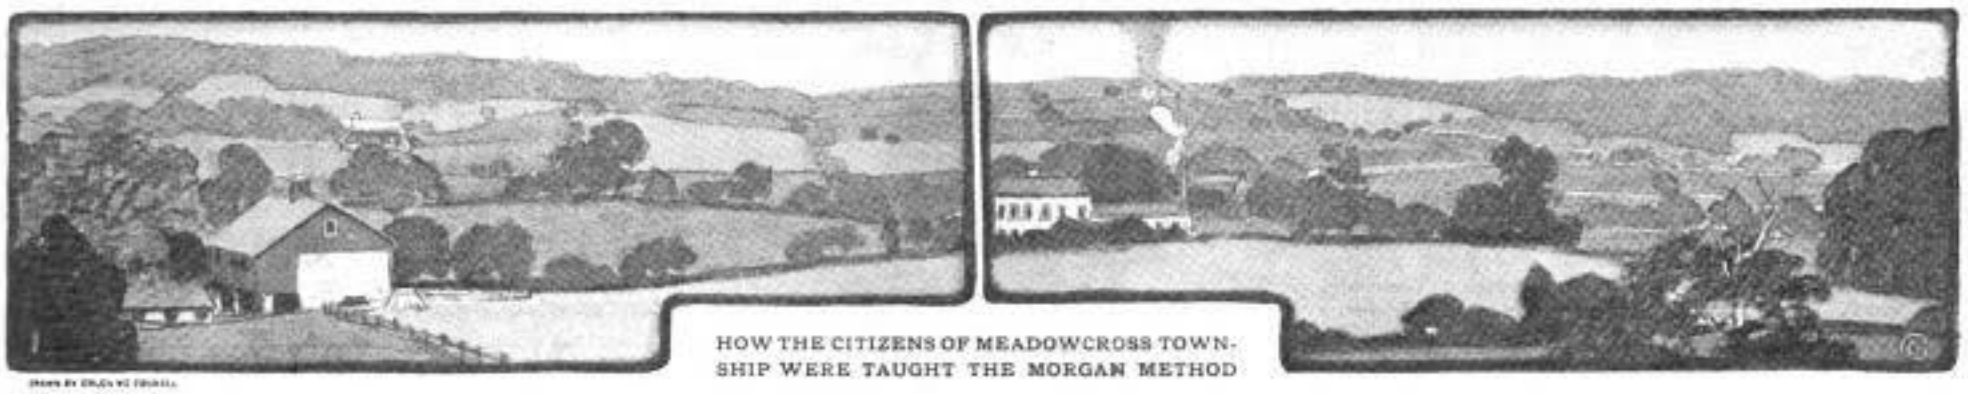
This done, the Emperor went up to the Empress, made a long and reverent bow, putting into the act all the homage due to his wife's valiant courage, and with a grave and tender gesture passed round her neck the ribbon of the Black Eagle.

The Empress, her eyes filled with tears, flung herself into the arms of Frederick III, and holding one another close they gave at last full vent to their sobs which they had so long and so heroically restrained.

All present then defiled before the new Emperor. Doctor Morell Mackenzie, who had performed the operation, stopped somewhat longer than the others. Frederick III had seized his two hands, clasping them warmly. At a writing-table the Emperor wrote for him a few words of thanks:

"I thank you for having made me live long enough to recompense the valiant courage of my wife!"

Then the drawing-room became empty. The Emperor ascended with the Empress to his apartments on the second floor. The lights gradually went out. Once more the White Villa was plunged in shadow and silence.



On the morrow I left San Remo for Paris. I have never since seen Madame Zirio, and I cannot say whether she still preserves the mysterious mauve letter. Nor have I any inkling even now as to the author of the extraordinary contents.

During my journalistic career I have been aided by many a chance; I have met on my route many a strange incident. But no chance and no strange incident was ever more marvelous than those which led me to San Remo to witness the dénouement of an historical tragedy.

And I felt it my duty, in these my Memoirs, to devote to this episode of my career an entire chapter, for it will show every one the extraordinary rôle, in the success of a journalist, played by that inscrutable goddess whom we call Destiny.

A MANIPULATED MARKET

HOW THE CITIZENS OF MEADOWCROSS TOWNSHIP WERE TAUGHT THE MORGAN METHOD

By Elliott Flower

Author of Policeman Flynn, The Spoilsmen, etc.

WHEN Jack Bentley came back to Meadowcross Township he was received with the most distinguished consideration by the good, but unsophisticated, people. Jack had been away for seven or eight years, and the rumors now circulated made him a financier of surpassing ability. Some of these rumors might have been traced to Jack himself, but that is a matter of no great importance. He talked freely and with such assurance of J. P. Morgan's methods that many of the good people gained the idea that he must have represented that financier in some of his big deals. Furthermore, his ideas were so progressive and his theories so startling that soon he was regarded as nothing short of a genius.

"Every one," he asserted, "has the same opportunities that Morgan had. Morgan began in a small way and gradually broadened the field of his activities, because he had the right idea—consolidation. At the beginning he couldn't have swung that steel trust or the ship combine any more than you could do such a thing now. His idea has been consolidation and organization, with a view to decreasing expenses and increasing profits, but he consolidated and organized on a minor scale first, and gradually his power grew."

At this the good people of Meadowcross Township could only look solemn, wag their heads, and "allow" that "by gum! that boy o' Bentley's has a big head on his shoulders, even if he did run away from the ol' man to git out o' workin' on the farm." For Jack had been something of a scapegrace son, although now he made amends by giving his father financial assistance.

Just why he had come back from the city, even temporarily, no one knew. Very likely it was a whim, a desire to see the old place again and to overwhelm the unimaginative and plodding farmers with his intimate knowledge of the ways of the great industrial and money kings. If so, that ambition was soon supplanted by another. He talked so much of opportunities that before long he began to see them in the most unexpected places.

"If you had brains and experience," he told some of the neighbors on one occasion, "you could make a mint of money. You can't do it by struggling along, each man for himself, but you can by consolidation. That's the secret of modern success. The capitalists combine, the workingmen combine, and the fellow who doesn't get into some sort of a combination is crowded out. It stands to reason that he should be, for he isn't strong enough to fight and he hasn't the facilities for cheapening production. He can't make what he possesses, whether it's brawn, brain or property, pay what it should. There is a waste of effort or a waste of material that handicaps him. He hasn't enough money properly to develop all the opportunities that lie open to him, and, in addition to that, he has to let others make money out of him that he might as well save. Look at the steel trust! Does it let the owners of iron mines make a profit out of it? Well, hardly. It owns its own mines. Before the combination the shipowners had a pretty good thing, but have they got it now? Not any. The steel trust owns its own ships that transport its ore from its own mines. And the packers! Why, they now own plants that make a profit out of what used to be waste. There is money for them in the by-products, but only unlimited capital enables them to get it out. The small concern can't do it. Instead, it has to hand over a profit to others, and, to that extent, it is dependent upon others who may make it trouble at any time."

The good people were impressed, but they could not see how such methods were to be made to apply to them. This idea of consolidation, or combination, was all right for men in a manufacturing line, but for farmers there would be no material benefit. True, they might operate their farms jointly, dividing the expenses and profits, but it would make little difference in the result.

Jack Bentley let them ponder the matter for a while—perhaps he needed the time to work the scheme out in his own mind—and then, after an interval of about a week, he took up the subject again.

"What do you do with your profits?" he asked. "You let the man who owns the steam thresher have some of them, don't you? And the flour-mill man gets some, and the elevator company, and the creamery man and half a dozen others. Well, that's all right, only it isn't good business sense. They provide certain things that you need, and they've got to be paid for it; but why don't you buy those things yourselves and keep your profits? You think you can't afford it, but that's because you're back numbers. I'll tell you how to do it—how J. P. Morgan would do it: Organize a stock company to take charge of all your farms, pay the appraised value of each farm in stock, levy a small assessment for operating expenses, and pretty soon you will be in a position to cut off the profit of the outsiders and take it yourselves. In addition to the usual officers, you can have a General Manager to supervise the cultivation of this consolidated farm under the direction and control of the Board of Directors. At first you will have to do the work yourselves, much as you do now, but after a little I don't see why this plan shouldn't enable you to hire laborers and devote your own time to the duties of directors."

The good, but unsophisticated, people of Meadowcross Township were aghast. Here was a stupendous scheme, but it sounded all right. Surely one great farm, embracing practically a whole township, could be operated for less than twenty farms that aggregated the same area. On some of the great farms of the Northwest the real owner was seldom seen, according to reports. He merely took the profits and enjoyed a life of leisure in the city, leaving his manager in control. But would the profits be sufficient to enable twenty families to do that?

Jack Bentley could not promise that all would become millionaires, but he was sure they could get rid of much of the hard work and live in greater comfort than ever before. They might at least move to the village, instead of remaining on the farm.

"You see," he explained, "this is only the beginning. There are other opportunities that naturally grow out of this one. Take the steam thresher, for instance. Individually you can't afford to own one, and certain enterprising men in the village are making a good profit out of you in consequence. They thresh your grain for a price. But there is no reason why the Consolidated Farms Company should rely on them, for it will be big enough and rich enough to have its own machine and thus save, or make, the profit that now goes to others. And there is no reason why the Consolidated Farms Company should not have its own creamery, its own cider mill, its own elevator and its own flour mill. This one big farm would furnish the raw material for all these and enable you to undersell individual farmers, if necessary, and still make a good profit. Then there is the summer-resort question. Most of you take summer boarders, and you don't make much out of them, either—hardly enough to pay for the trouble. Well, you have a pretty good river skirting the southern edge of your consolidated farm, and you could easily put up a hotel there and hire a man to run it. That's another thing that's possible by combination only.

"Now, it may be that all these enterprises are more than one company should attempt to handle. In that case you might organize a separate company for each, making them interdependent. In other words, the Meadowcross Creamery Company should have a monopoly of that business so far as the Consolidated Farms Company is concerned, and in the same way the Cooperative Elevator Company should have assurances that no grain will be diverted to other elevators. You catch the idea, don't you? One way or another you'd make all the money there is to be made. You would be working for yourselves, and if one company failed to show a profit the dividends from some other would be the higher in consequence. The cash couldn't get away from you, for you would have all the avenues choked up; it would have to stay right here in Meadowcross Township."

For two days the good people walked on air and had golden visions. At last they had learned the secret of Mr. Morgan's success. Not only that, but they saw how his methods could be of practical use to them. Consolidation gave his companies strength to do that which would be impossible otherwise, and, whenever necessary, they were made interdependent—lovely word!—by ironclad contracts. Meadowcross Township lived on "consolidation" and "interdependence," and lived high—in its mind. Then old Heber Dangley suddenly jarred the good people by asking about the money necessary to get all these enterprises started.

"We ain't got it," he said, "an' it's goin' to cost a lot at the beginnin'. I ain't sayin' thet the scheme is wrong, but we ain't got the money for all this here—not even if we took out every cent we all got in the bank."

"Oh, that's easily arranged," asserted Jack Bentley, when this objection was brought to his attention. "That's often the situation of men who have the great ideas and the great opportunities, and they have to make some concessions to capital. Some of the stock will have to go to the men who advance the money; that's all. I can fix it easily. There are lots of men who will be glad to buy in, and who will be of value to the company, too, because of their knowledge of how these big things are done."

This seemed reasonable, and Bentley went to the city to see about raising the necessary cash. He returned in about a week accompanied by two men, and, contrary to expectations, neither of them turned out to be J. P. Morgan. One was a lawyer, and the other was introduced as a financial agent. Both were sharp, direct and inquisitive, but they finally decided that the investment was a good one.

"It looks all right," asserted Dickman, the lawyer, at the conclusion of his investigation. "You're making a fair living out of your farms now, and, with the economy that will come with consolidation, you ought to make half again as much. If properly handled the profits should increase fifty per cent. Add to this what you will make out of the elevator, the thresher, the flour mill, the creamery, and the other allied industries, and I don't see why you can't treble or even quadruple your present incomes. There ought to be a big profit in the summer resort alone, if properly conducted. Of course, it will take considerable cash, but a favorable report from my friend, Delvarr, will bring all you want of that."

The good, but unsophisticated, people of Meadowcross Township immediately began to let their thoughts turn to automobiles and houses with steam heat; but Delvarr brought them back to the consideration of existing conditions.

"My principals," he said, "will put up whatever money is necessary, but they will naturally expect a twenty-five per cent. interest in each of the companies, and also the right to name the various managers needed. This will be necessary to protect their interests."

There was a painful pause, and then Heber Dangley inquired, "What's the matter with our interests? Ain't we puttin' up everything we got in the world?"

Dickman assured them that the terms were reasonable, but they were hard-headed men in some ways and they refused to be convinced.

"I reckon Jack'll want something fer puttin' the scheme through," suggested Moses Magee.

"Oh, ten per cent. will suit me," returned Jack Bentley.

"Makin' thirty-five per cent. we're handin' over," put in Dangley. "I reckon you kin count me out."

"Me, too," several others promptly added. It seemed to them too much like giving away more than a third of their farms.

Jack Bentley looked worried. It never would do to lose such a good thing as this promised to be, and when it became apparent that the farmers would not yield, he took the two city men aside for a conference.

"Might as well be modest in the beginning," he urged. "We'll get it all in the end." And much more to the same effect, as a result of which it was finally decided to accept fifteen per cent. of the stock of the Consolidated Farms Company in full for all services, including Jack's. For the money advanced notes were to be given, secured by mortgages; and the capitalists were to have the privilege for the first year of appointing the managers of everything except the consolidated farm. The big farm represented present tangible property, which the good people would not permit to pass from their control. At the expiration of a year the stockholders themselves would assume full charge.

Dickman drew up the various articles of incorporation, and also the contracts which made the companies interdependent. Some surprise was expressed that the name of J. P. Morgan did not appear anywhere in the contracts or mortgages, but the opinion prevailed that Mr. Morgan probably wished to remain in the background, fearing that the knowledge that he was risking so large a sum of money might hurt his financial standing.

After the preliminaries were arranged there was gratifying haste in perfecting the details and getting everything in working order. A certain small company owned half a dozen creameries, one of which was in Meadowcross Township. The situation was carefully explained, and the company agreed to sell this creamery, it being evident that no outsider could expect to get any business under the new conditions. If it did not sell a new creamery would be built. In the same way the elevator at the village of Meadowcross was secured, and also the flour mill. As a matter of fact, the circumstances made it easy to secure them cheap. There was no trouble about getting a new steam thresher, either, but the summer-hotel project took time. Still, the consolidation had been perfected in the fall, and by spring the hotel was ready for business and had been extensively advertised. It was not all that it should be, but it would do for a beginning, according to Jack Bentley, and later they would build a more pretentious one. Bentley himself took charge of the hotel.

Meanwhile the speculative fever got a grip on the good people of Meadowcross Township, and certain most extraordinary happenings served to strengthen it. One never could tell just which company was going to show a profit. The stock had been divided throughout according to the original land-holdings of the farmers, but they began to trade, each desiring to get that which paid the best. After a preliminary slump creamery stock went to a premium, and some of the farmers gave flour-mill stock, with a cash bonus, for it. The creamery was the only one of the concerns that declared monthly dividends, but the books of the elevator company showed that a profit was accumulating there. The consolidated farms did well, and one by one the farmers lightened their individual labors and left the work to hired help. It really took so much time to keep track of their investments that they could not give their attention to the details of farm cultivation. Furthermore, they could see that they were prospering, so they could afford to take life a little easier.

As a result of this trading the stock quotations began to fluctuate, and there were gains and losses—all on paper. But presently Jack Bentley and Delvarr began to buy quietly for cash. They never seemed to care for the high-priced stocks, but they were willing to take those that had depreciated. They said it was to steady the market and restore confidence, and that certainly had a nice sound. When John Canwood discovered that the cider mill would show a deficit at the end of the season, in spite of the fact that there were splendid orchards on the consolidated farm, Bentley reasoned with him gently.

"What's the use of frightening people and destroying confidence?" he asked. "If you're worried, I'll take the stock off your hands at—well, say sixty. Of course you can't expect more than that if the books show no profit." He got the stock for cash—somehow Bentley and Delvarr never sold, and seldom traded, any stock—and then he cautioned Canwood not to alarm people, but just to mention quietly to any one who was nervous that he could easily dispose of his stock. In a little time Bentley and Delvarr between them had about eighty per cent. of the cider-mill stock, and after that, strangely enough, the business began to show a slight improvement. At least, the manager's reports were no longer pessimistic. The cider mill was perhaps the least important of the enterprises, and control of it did not mean much, except as an indication of what could be done. The representatives of capital had begun with only a fifteen per cent. interest in the Consolidated Farms Company. They still had that, and in addition now absolutely controlled the cider mill and had acquired a minor interest in most of the other companies. At first, as explained, they would not trade, but in time they consented to do a little trading. This was when reports and fluctuations became most confusing. Every manager issued a monthly report, and the reports from the Cooperative Elevator Company became really alarming. The good, but unsophisticated, people studied them to see where the trouble lay, but they could only discover that the expenses were eating up the receipts.

"Never mind," said Jack Bentley, "the profit will show up somewhere else. Look at the Meadowcross Creamery Company."

Truly, that was making a wondrous showing, and there was a sudden strong desire to get rid of the elevator stock and secure the creamery stock. Bentley had acquired some creamery stock before it was in such demand, and, "just to steady the market," he was willing to trade a little of it for elevator stock. Of course, as one was profitable, according to reports, and the other was not, it would be preposterous to expect an even trade, but he would accept elevator stock on a fifty per cent. basis.

"I'd rather have ten shares o' stock that pays than twenty that don't," asserted Len Riley, and he transferred his elevator stock to Bentley, receiving in exchange fifty per cent. of its face value in creamery stock. Others followed his example, some getting cash and some creamery stock, so that presently the representatives of capital controlled the elevator.

"And when the time comes," laughed Bentley, "we'll put that creamery stock down to a point where we can get it back cheap."

One man only—Moses Magee—did not seem to worry. But, then, he was very much of a back number, for he continued to work on the consolidated farm as hard as he had worked on his own little farm before. He was the manager of the consolidated farm—the one managership that the good people had refused to surrender to the representatives of capital—and he did not even find time to consult the monthly reports relating to the other enterprises.

"Somehow I don't seem to git the hang o' them things," he explained. "I can't rightly make out what they mean, so I don't bother with 'em. If there's anything comin' I git it; if there ain't I don't."

When, one by one, the good people moved to the village, Moses still stuck to the big farm; nor was he lured from it even when the summer hotel opened and a reduced rate was made to stockholders. However, as manager of the farm, it was perhaps necessary that he should stick to it.

One day, while Moses was at work, one of the other stockholders came to him.

"Mose," said the farmer, "got your elevator stock yet?"

"I reckon," answered Moses.

"Don't want to trade it fer creamery stock, do ye?"

"I don't mind," said Moses. "I ain't lookin' fer no trade, but I figger one kind's as good as another in the long run. If you're feelin' that you'll be happier with elevator stock, why, any on 'em suits me."

Now, at this time the city men, by their clever manipulation of the little market they had created, had secured practical control of everything except the consolidated farm and the creamery, and the first year of the experiment was drawing to a close. The good people were slow to part with their farm stock, and the creamery had been left to the last for trading purposes. As fast as the interdependent enterprises passed under the control of the schemers they began to prosper, and the farmers, beginning to understand that they had been outwitted in some way, were anxious to get back the stock they had sacrificed. Meanwhile, there had been a sudden terrific slump in creamery stock, the last report showing a sad condition of affairs. As a matter of fact, to use Bentley's expression, the time had come "to put on the screws," and the farmers saw their incomes dwindling. They had to sell to the interdependent companies, and those companies had forced down the price for the raw material on the plea that outside market conditions made it necessary. The rate for threshing had been boosted also, and now that the creamery had suddenly ceased paying dividends the outlook was dark indeed. The profit seemed to lie entirely in those companies in which they no longer had an interest.

"Of course," Bentley had explained suavely, "you made a serious mistake in disposing of your interests in these other companies, but we had to humor you in order to steady the market." Bentley could bring in this "steady the market" phrase in a way that was very impressive. "Now the only way to get this stock back," he went on, "is to trade consolidated farm stock for it. You can't get it all back that way, but we can let you have a little and we're willing to make it an even trade."

Bentley and Delvarr had put aside the surplus stock in the various companies, over and above the bare controlling interest, for this very purpose, and they now expected so to manage as to secure a controlling interest in the Consolidated Farms Company. But Moses unwittingly interfered with their plans. He made the trade requested, and the report was quickly circulated. Heber Dangley showed up promptly, and he also wanted to trade creamery for elevator stock.

"Like to oblige," said Moses, "but I can't do it. Only had a little of each kind, an' I jest traded my elevator stock."

"How about the flour mill?" asked Dangley. "Will you take creamery stock fer that?"

"I don't mind," answered Moses. "I reckon they'll all pay about the same in time."

Then came others with similar propositions, and to each Moses gave the same careless, "I don't mind." As a matter of fact, he really thought he was doing a good stroke of business. He had kept out of the trading previously, and did not seek it now, but through all the fluctuations creamery stock had been the steadiest and had paid the best. It had had one slump at the beginning, just to enable Bentley and Delvarr to get what they wanted for trading purposes, and then had rallied and paid regularly. Now was the time Bentley and Delvarr expected to get it back, but it failed to come.

"What in thunder is the matter with the yaps?" asked Delvarr.

"Give it up," answered Bentley. "Somehow the way they're acting doesn't look right, but they can't hold out long. We've got them in a corner."

"Just the same, it would ease my mind to have some of that creamery stock show up," said Delvarr. "I expected they'd hold off a little on the consolidated farms, but it isn't natural for creamery to keep out of sight."

At the first opportunity Delvarr suggested to Len Riley that, if the creamery slump worried him any, he'd take the stock off his hands.

"Ain't got any of it," answered Riley.

To the same suggestion Heber Dangley made the same reply, but he refused to say to whom he had sold it. His only reason for doing this was that Delvarr "seemed too pesky curious." Furthermore, as a result of what had happened, there was a feeling of resentment toward the city men.

Delvarr went back to Bentley, much disturbed.

"It looks bad," he said. "Somebody has been buying up that stock."

"Heard of any strangers being about?" asked Bentley.

"Not a one."

"Well, we've got to unearth that stock somehow. I'll see what Dad can tell me, and meanwhile you sound some of them on consolidated farms. I hope that stock hasn't disappeared, too."

The schemers were now really worried. Everything had happened according to expectations until now, and, so long as the farmers had the stock, they had no fear of results. Proper manipulation would force them to sell in order to live, for there would be no profit in the two companies to which they still clung. But if some worldly-wise and resourceful men had got wind of the scheme there might be trouble. The consolidated farm was the basis of all else, and the schemers had to get control of that. Then—well, then, the farmers would be holding the empty bag, and would have gained some costly experience in stock manipulation.

Bentley's father was distressed when his son came to see him. It looked to him as if some underhanded work were being done, and he did not hesitate to say so, although he admitted that he did not fully understand the details.

"Don't worry, Dad," said Bentley good-naturedly. "It's a J. P. Morgan game that we're playing, but you'll come out all right. I'll take care of that. When the right time comes we'll have a complete reorganization, and I'll see that you're properly represented in the new company. All you've got to do is to give me a proxy to vote your consolidated farms stock. But, meanwhile, do you know what's become of the creamery stock?"

Bentley, senior, shook his head doubtfully and asserted that it "didn't look right," but finally informed his son that Moses Magee had been acquiring creamery stock. Thereupon Jack Bentley breathed a sigh of relief. Moses knew all about farming, but that was all that he did know. They would give him a little time, for he was an obstinate fellow, but he would be unable to hold out long; he would be looking for ready cash shortly. Incidentally, while waiting, they could make it more and more apparent that consolidated farms would pay nothing, while the minor companies that they already controlled would declare good dividends, and thus they could gradually bring the farmers to the point of trading for the surplus stock put aside for that purpose.

Here was where they made their great mistake. Moses knew nothing of the frightful slump in creamery stock until his wife told him. Then he would have accepted almost any offer, but he was ashamed to make a proposition.

"I reckon," he said, "I'm eight kinds of a fool, but I got my salary as manager o' the farm yet, anyhow."

"You won't have it if them fellers git control," she returned, "an' s'long as it ain't makin' any money there's a mighty big temptation fer people to sell. Why ain't there profit in it any more?"

"We got to sell to these here other companies," he explained, "an' they won't pay fair prices. The conditions an' the market is bad, they say."

"What d'you s'pose that Morgan man would do?" she asked.

"Gosh-hang the Morgan man!" he retorted. "I been hearin' too much o' him."

"Well, s'posin' he owned the creamery," she persisted. "Couldn't he make it pay? They got to buy from it, ain't they? An' I reckon you must pretty near own it."

It took five minutes for this to percolate through the brain of Moses, and then he made a dive for an old trunk, from the bottom of which he took his creamery stock.

"By gum!" he cried, "I got 'most three-quarters of it all." He walked the floor excitedly for a few minutes, and then announced that he was going to the city. "I got an idee," he explained, "an' I got to talk it over with Cousin Jim. I reckon he kin set me right, fer he's in the law business himself. I'm goin' to git copies of all the contracts an' take 'em with me."

Moses returned from the city chuckling. "I got 'em," he told his wife, but more he would not say. Nor did he seem in any hurry to act, further than to advise all the farmers to hold on to whatever stock they had left, and to give him power to represent them. "Leave it to me," he said. And they did.

Bentley and Delvarr grew more and more anxious as time passed, and finally Delvarr came to him with an offer for his creamery stock.

"Ain't goin' to sell," was his reply.

"But there's no money in it," urged Delvarr.

"There's goin' to be money in it," retorted Moses.

"I don't see how you make that out."

"Well," said Moses, "you got your own manager in there now, but his year's most up, an' then the stockholders has the say. I got a good bit more'n half the stock, an' I'm goin' to put in my own manager. An' prices is goin' up."

"What?"

"They're goin' to be doubled, an' mebbe more, an' your blamed old summer hotel has got to buy from me or I'll git damages on that there interdependent contract. I reckon, with the butter an' milk an' cream an' things you'll need, I kin make that creamery pay big."

Delvarr reported to Bentley, and then they sent in haste for Dickman, the lawyer. He came up from the city, and the three had a session with Moses.

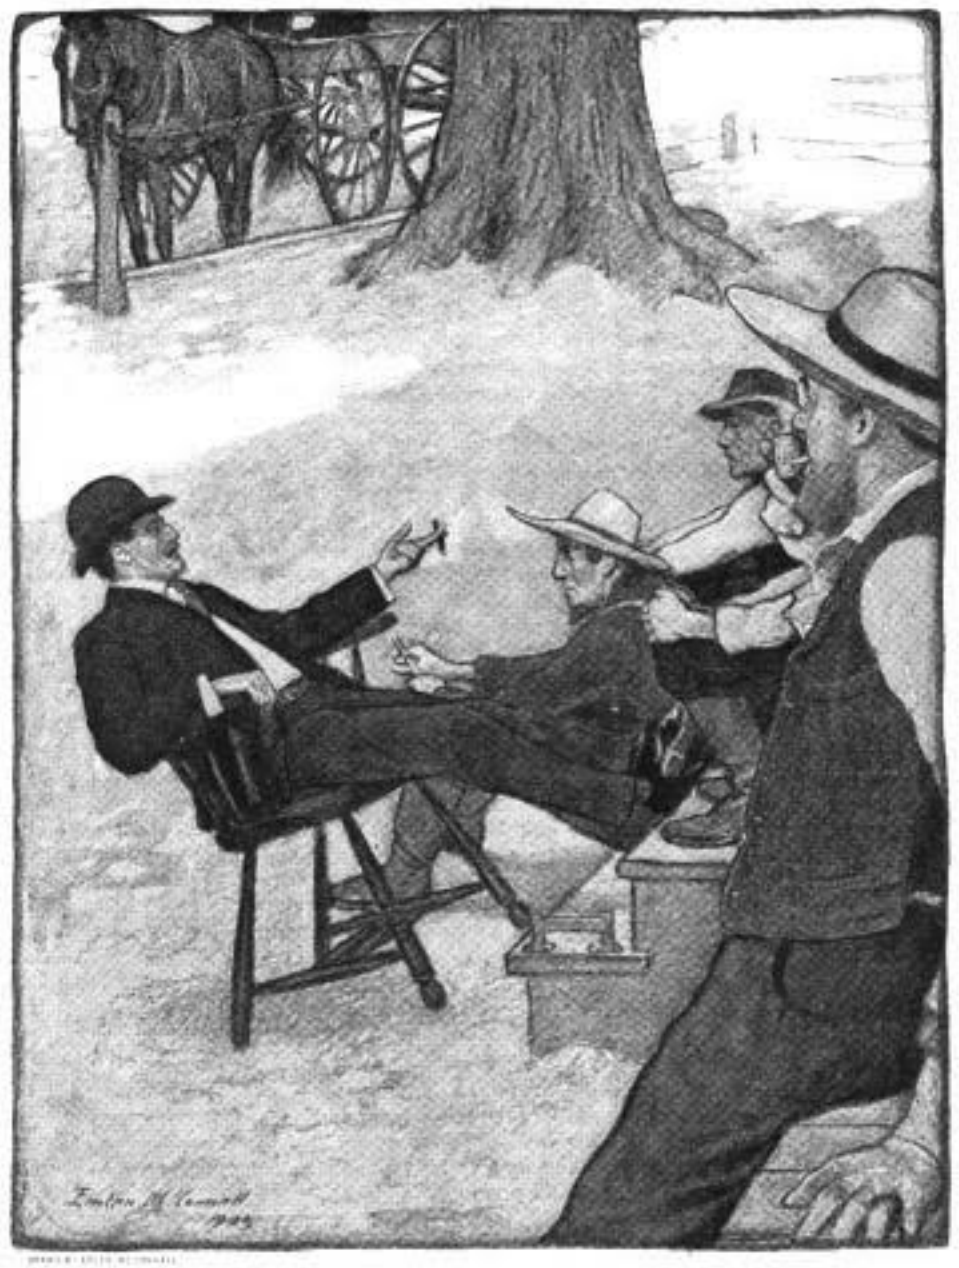
"Be reasonable," urged the lawyer. "We admit that you've got a little the best of us on this creamery deal, but we control everything else except the farm, and you can't afford to fight us."

"I wouldn't give shucks fer what you own," asserted Moses.

"Don't be foolish," persisted the lawyer. "The creamery can't be made to support all of you, and, under the various contracts, you can't make anything out of the farm until we're ready to let you. So far as the farm is concerned, you've got to sell to us at prices fixed by a committee of the managers of all the allied industries, and, as matters now stand, you never can get control of that committee. It may take a little time, but we can simply bust you all."

Moses leaned back in his chair and looked at them with a calm, superior smile.

"I learned a few things down to the city," he said. "I took them there contracts with me. We got to sell to your companies everything we raise that's in their line, but we ain't goin' to raise anything that's in their line. Then what happens? Hey? That there flour mill o' yourn has got to have the wheat from this township so's to make any money, ain't it? Well, there ain't goin' to be no wheat."



Dickman, Bentley and Delvarr looked at each other, and for a moment they had nothing to say.

"You been puttin' up prices fer threshin'," Moses went on, "but if we don't raise grain we don't need your old machine, an' you might as well put it in the scrap pile, fer over in the next township they got one. An' if we don't raise grain what you goin' to do with your elevator? 'Tain't placed right to git grain from nowhere else."

"Surely you're not serious," argued the lawyer.

"Who says so?" demanded Moses. "Jest you watch an' see. I got the run o' this thing now, an' I'm goin' to have you all up in the air, as Cousin Jim says. Only, gosh-hang it! we got to give you apples fer your cider mill, but I don't reckon you'll make a whole mint out o' that. Looks to me like you got some mighty bad investments on your hands. There ain't even goin' to be much money in the hotel after payin' the creamery prices."

The three went away, and a few days later they returned with two more men from the city, and the conversation indicated that these were two of the men who had really advanced the money. They were speculators who were not too particular as to how they got their money so long as the returns were big. In this deal they were part of a little syndicate that had been formed as a result of Bentley's glowing description of the magnificent opportunity to acquire practically a whole township, including the industries, for which they made the preliminary advances. Dickman introduced them.

JUST WHY HE HAD COME BACK FROM THE CITY NO ONE KNEW

"If you're going to be ugly," asserted Dickman, "we've decided that it will be necessary to foreclose the mortgages. You see, you haven't got things so much your own way as you thought. We wanted to be easy——"

"An' git everything in sight," broke in Moses; "but I ain't played my hand yet. I been holdin' back a right bower. Now, them mortgages was made to secure notes, an' the notes fall due one a year fer ten years. The first one ain't due for more'n another month, an' when it's due it's goin' to be paid. I got that fixed with Cousin Jim, an' he's middlin' well posted on what's what."

"Paid!"

"That's what I said."

"Can't we compromise this thing?" asked one of the strangers conciliatorily. "You can't make anything out of the farm if you don't raise grain, and we have you at our mercy if you do."

"Can't, hey?" ejaculated Moses.

"What will you raise?"

"Well," replied Moses, "I was thinkin' we could use a good bit of it fer a dairy farm, s'long as we got the creamery. An' the soil is more'n middlin' fair fer fruit, an' they do say there's a big call fer grape juice. It would take a bit o' time, but it looks to me like we might go in fer puttin' up our own grape juice. An' there's a chance fer live stock, too, with mebbe a bit o' tobacco off in one corner. Your committee o' managers kin fix the price fer what's in your line, but the manager settles what we'll raise, an' I'm the manager. Why, if we're put to it, we'll try raisin' alfalfa, by gum! Say! but wouldn't your ol' thresher an' elevator an' flour mill git rich on alfalfa!"

"I think," put in Dickman, "that we could go into court and force you to raise what we need."

"'Tain't in the contract," retorted Moses, "an' anyhow, Cousin Jim didn't think you'd be lookin' fer a chance to have your scheme showed up in court—not with him cross-examinin'."

"What do you want?" asked Delvarr.

"Everything," answered Moses promptly.

"Have you any plan to propose?"

"Well, I ain't much on plans, but I tell you what you do: you jest run down to the city an' see Cousin Jim. He's got some friends who think these here mortgages an' notes is good, if we kin git the whole thing under one head ag'in' an' everything goin' smoothly. I ain't sayin' he'll give you the top price, but, if you're good, I think mebbe he'll let you git out even or pretty near even. He says if we git all these here companies consolidated into one his friends think it will be pretty good security."

"We've got to turn over all the property, then?" suggested Delvarr.

"Looks like that."

"And if we refuse?"

"Well, after we've been raisin' alfalfa fer a bit I reckon we kin buy you out pretty cheap."

The party marched gloomily out, but paused at the gate, and all looked at Dickman, the lawyer.

"See Cousin Jim," said the latter with a sigh, "and be nice to him. You may get out whole and you may not, but you'll come closer to it that way than any other."

From the porch Moses called to Bentley to come back.

"Thought I'd tell you," he said, "that this here is the way that Morgan man does business. You didn't seem to rightly git the hang o' his methods. But we ain't goin' to store it up ag'in' your poor ol' Dad. He comes in on the reorganization, an' mebbe we'll give him an extra share to sort o' compensate him fer havin' sech a son."

Then he laughed, but there was no laughter in the party that drove away.

Bacon's Billet

A SOUTHERN Congressman tells a story in regard to the Honorable Augustus O. Bacon, United States Senator from Georgia. Senator Bacon is recognized as a very serious-minded statesman whose disinclination to resort to jest in debate has added to his force in national affairs.

"At the beginning of the present session," says the Congressman, "when the chairmanships of committees were being awarded, Senator Bacon's name was considered. As a Democrat he could not, of course, expect to capture any of the most coveted billets dispensed by the enemy. Nevertheless, the Senators having the matter in hand very graciously decided to give Senator Bacon substantial recognition.

"'Give the Senator from Georgia something worth while,' said one, 'for he is a mighty serious man.'

"Another Senator, at that, exclaimed:

"'I have it! As Senator Bacon has by nature been spared a sense of humor, let's make him chairman of the Committee on Woman Suffrage. Then we shall have a chairman who can maintain his gravity when the women come before the committee to make their annual arguments.'

"The appointment was unanimously made."

Fortunes and Freaks in Advertising

By Paul Latzke

SOME STORIES OF FAMOUS SUCCESSES MADE BY MEN WHO HAVE USED PRINTERS' INK

BY SOME STRANGE WHIM OF RECKLESSNESS HE LEFT THE PAPER BEHIND

WHEN the January wind comes at a certain angle across Boston Common wise men keep indoors and animals seek the sheltered way. The air cuts through to the body like a knife. The heaviest overcoat is scant protection. Furs turn to feathery icicles. There is then comfort nowhere except indoors before a blazing fire. Those who must be abroad take the nearest way, and the street-car companies for once reap a harvest of "short riders."

Out of such conditions it requires rare favor of the gods to build success, but the story of a family from Lynn shows that it is possible. It happened that a rich man, having a directors' meeting to attend on such a January forenoon, jumped aboard the car on which the elder brother of this family—a young elder brother—was journeying to his home in Lynn. The rich man carried in his hand a copy of a Boston newspaper, and at the end of his short ride, by some strange whim of recklessness he left the paper behind. The elder brother, having a long, cold ride before him, and having no pennies to waste on newspapers, picked up the abandoned paper with eager satisfaction. And from this incident grew the making of millions out of an $84 check, and the beginning of an advertising romance that probably has no parallel.

This young man from Lynn was taking the $84 check home, and he had it very closely buttoned in his inside pocket. It represented the first substantial sum he and his family had had in their possession for several years. At the other end of the car line his mother and brothers and sisters were waiting hungrily for his appearance with the small fortune. They had been living on very thin provender for months, and looked to this check for a taste of good, strong food. The family originally had been among the most substantial people in Lynn. The father was a wealthy builder, and in 1874 had over one hundred houses, finished and under construction. Then a financial squeeze came, and he lost every dollar he had in the world. Fortunately, there remained the home, which was in the mother's name, and somehow the family managed for four years to keep from starving. Then in 1878 the elder brother had an idea. His mother, in the years of their prosperity, had brewed a certain medicinal compound, the recipe for which had been given her by an old German woman. Of this compound she had given away thousands of bottles, refusing pay even from strangers who asked the medicine of her. Her son's idea had to do with this medicine.

"Why not make up the compound and sell it?" he suggested.

The mother was doubtful.

"Who would buy it?"

"The people to whom you used to give it and lots of others when they hear of it. You've got nearly a thousand letters upstairs from the people who wrote to thank you for the medicine. We'll take some of these letters and have them printed; then we'll distribute them as advertisements."

With considerable misgiving, $2.65 was taken out of the slender family stock to pay for a thousand small, four-page circulars. The three brothers distributed these circulars from house to house. Next day they went over the same route, carrying in canvas bags a supply of the medicine which their mother had meanwhile brewed over the kitchen stove. Wherever a circular had been left they rang the doorbell and offered their wares. It was slow work, but it brought in enough money to keep the family from want. Here and there a drug store took several bottles, and circulars were left on the drug-store counters. Finally the demand reached a wholesale drug house in Boston and they ordered a gross. It was the payment for this first big sale, the $84 check, that the elder brother was carrying home when he happened to pick up the rich man's newspaper. He was too cold to take deep interest in the new "stories" spread out before him, but he finally lighted on a line that held his eye. It was printed on the editorial page in black type, and read:

Circulation, 54,000 Copies Daily.

The line fascinated him. It brought a wicked temptation to his mind.

"It takes us," he said to himself, "about three days to put out a thousand circulars, and they cost us $2.65 undelivered. At that rate 54,000 would take over half a year to put out, and the printing would come to $143. Now if we only had the money we could put them all out in one day through this newspaper, and the cost would probably be no greater."

Just then the car passed the newspaper office.

The young man ran to the door and jumped out.

"I'll just see what it would cost," he explained to himself.

Inside, he handed the man a copy of his circular.

"What would you charge to put that in to-morrow morning's paper?"

"All of it?"

"Yes."

Mechanically the man counted the lines.

"$63.40."

"On the front page?"

"We don't put 'ads' there."

"Then it would do me no good."

"Very well, I'll put it there so you can try the effect."

The young man drew his breath hard. He knew what the sum asked meant at home; but the fever was on him. So steadying his voice as best he could he said:

"All right, you may print it if you will take in payment a check for $84 and give me the change."

The advertising man was willing and five minutes afterward his customer was on his way to Lynn again, but his precious board had melted to $20.60. At the house he was met by the whole family.

"Did you get the check?"

"Yes," he answered sententiously.

"Where—where is it? Let's see it?"

The questions came from all sides. They were hungry, clamorous for a sight of the precious paper. They wanted to handle it, feel of it, look at the figures.

Panic suddenly seized the boy. His intoxication passed away, and he realized what he had done. For a few minutes longer he fenced. Then, in desperation, he blurted out the story, and a wail of anguish and accusation went up. It was the most terrible tragedy that had come to this family since the dark days of 1874. The storm of words wore itself out after a while. The mother and daughters settled to deep, bitter crying. His brothers sulked in angry, hopeless silence. The little business that had at last promised a livelihood was ruined. The money left out of the $84 was not enough to face the most pressing demands of the butcher and the grocer. To buy more bottles, to put up a fresh supply of the medicine, to pay the printer for more circulars, was out of the question. For forty-eight hours the family remained in black despair. Then something happened. A messenger boy came with a telegram. It was from another wholesale drug house and read:

"Ship at once five gross compound by express."

It took the messenger boy a long time to get over the impression that the family had all gone suddenly crazy. They hugged each other and laughed and cried, and carried on generally as properly brought up lunatics do on the stage.

With reflection came quiet. There were no bottles and no labels and no compound. But somehow the bottles and labels were forced from reluctant dealers and printers, and a big fire was made in the kitchen stove under the medicine kettle. All day and all night and all of the next day the family brewed and bottled, and then the "five gross" were ready for the express company.

During the nine years following, through H. P. Hubbard, of New Haven, then one of the great advertising agents of America, the family spent over one and a half million dollars for advertising. They began on $1000 worth of credit extended them by Mr. Hubbard on the strength of their sales in and around Boston. When the mother died she left a business valued at several million dollars.

"WHERE—WHERE IS IT? LET'S SEE IT?"

What the Woman Left with the Change

ANOTHER fine advertising story, almost as fascinating as that of the family from Lynn, had its inception on a hot summer's afternoon in the thriving Ohio town of Tiffin. Its final chapters cannot be written, but the action of the story has already carried to New York, and finds expression there in the finest building to be seen in the wholesale dry-goods district of that city. This building, only recently completed, is located on Mercer Street near Eighth. The street door leads into an outer office as spacious as an assembly hall, and here is generally to be seen the man out of whose idea the house grew—A. J. Stewart.

Mr. Stewart was a dry-goods clerk in Tiffin. On the summer day when his real life story started he had gone to work as usual, put his stock in order as usual, and waited on his customers as usual, without dreaming that he was at the turning point in his career. In the course of the afternoon there entered a woman who asked for two yards of black velveteen. After he had cut it off and wrapped it up for her and she had left the counter Stewart turned to one of his fellow-clerks, John U. May.

"John," he said, "did you see what that woman bought?"

"No."

"Two yards of velveteen for skirt-binding."

"Well, that's nothing remarkable," replied John.

"No," admitted Stewart. "It isn't. But it has given me an idea. Women are coming in here constantly for the same thing. After they get the velveteen they cut it into strips, sew it together and finally turn out a very inferior material with which to bind skirts. Now, why wouldn't it be a good thing to save them all that trouble?"

"And how would you do that?" inquired May.

"Why, get a machine that will cut the velveteen and sew the strips together. Then put it up in rolls and sell it ready for use."

May instantly saw the value of the idea. When business closed that evening and for many evenings after they talked the matter over, and finally concluded they would go into the business, then unknown, of manufacturing velveteen skirt-binding. They interested one of their friends named Potter, and organized the firm of Stewart, Potter & May. Stewart and May resigned their positions and moved to Cleveland, where they secured the services of a mechanic to work out Stewart's idea for a machine. With their machine finished they started into business and found a limited market for their wares. The dry-goods merchants were quite alive to the merits of ready-made skirt-binding, but the processes of introducing it to the customer was necessarily very slow. About this time there appeared in Cleveland a salesman for a Boston jobbing house, named L. F. Howe. Stewart and May made it their business to interest him in the new invention and succeeded so well that Howe bought Potter's interest, the firm being reorganized as Stewart, Howe & May, as it stands to-day. These three young men worked along until 1892, when, feeling the need of advanced methods, the firm was incorporated and moved to New York. Mr. May retired and George S. Curtis, of New York, an expert in financial matters, took his place.

Mr. Curtis, even more than his associates, appreciated the field open to the new company if only the women of America could be educated to the use of ready-made velveteen skirt-binding. This seemed a difficult proposition, for at this time—only ten years ago—probably less than one per cent. of the dresses worn were bound with this material. Mr. Curtis had had no more experience in educational work of this kind than had his associates, but thinking the matter over he made up his mind that there was one certain way to achieve the end he was after.

"What we want to do," he said to the other members of the concern, "is to advertise. If we continue in the way we are it will take us forever to get the business on the basis it ought to be. We must continue to depend on the good will of the retailer to push our goods. As he's got other things to do, and skirt-binding is a small item with him, our progress will be slow. If we go directly to the women of the country, telling them of the great saving of time and money and labor that may be effected by buying skirt-binding ready made, we shall create a natural demand and our goods will sell themselves."

At first this proposition was received coldly, especially when Mr. Curtis announced that they ought to appropriate at least $5000 as a starter. Five thousand dollars was a very large sum of money to the firm at that time and to invest this in an unknown field was considered foolhardy.

But Mr. Curtis is a man who rarely lets go, and before he finished he had his $5000 appropriation. This was in the spring of 1894. Within five months the business had jumped twenty per cent. Even Mr. Curtis was amazed. As for the other members of the company they were fairly carried off their feet, and when Mr. Curtis asked for additional funds for advertising they told him he could have any amount he thought necessary. At his suggestion $100,000 was voted in a lump sum. In less than a year the business had doubled, and orders were coming in faster than they could be filled.

From one floor the business spread to two, then to three, then to four, and then to five. Finally the company bought the present site on Mercer Street, and erected there the building that stands a monument to the genius of advertising. The yearly output of the company is to-day sufficient to encircle the earth several times. Its wares are found in every hamlet in the land, and it is doubtful if there is a woman, even in the backwoods, who does not know their trademark.

The Necessity for "Sticking to It"

IT IS a characteristic of most conspicuous advertising campaigns that their success is generally to be traced, as in the case of Mr. Stewart's ready-made skirt-binding, to an underlying idea, but the failure to understand the necessity for perseverance has caused the ruin of some of the most promising properties that have ever been advertised into great success. An instructive example is that of a Philadelphia concern whose founder made millions out of the exploitation of an excellent laundry soap. For ten years his advertisements were the talk of the country.

At the outset of his career he called on the publisher of one of the great daily New York newspapers one day and asked the rate for a whole page. The price given him was satisfactory and then he said:

"Suppose I split my advertisement up and make two half-pages of it in different parts of the paper, would the price still be the same?"

The publisher told him it would.

"Well, then, suppose I split it up into quarter pages?"

"As long as you use the space of a page in one issue the price will be the same."

Before the soap-maker had finished he had an agreement from the unsuspecting publisher under the terms of which he was permitted to use the space of a page split up into inch advertisements to be scattered throughout the paper. Next morning the New York public was startled by the injunction: "Don't be a Clam," which appeared in big letters in 140 places throughout the paper. This was followed up in a few days with: "Don't be a Clam; a Clam Never Moves." Then: "A Clam is Not Progressive; a Clam Never Uses So-and-So's Soap; Don't be a Clam."

"HOW MUCH SPACE DO YOU WANT, MR. BONNER?"

This man spent enormous sums in advertising along this line. Nothing like it had ever been seen in the country. It was freely prophesied that no concern could stand the strain of such an expenditure; but a business was built up that was among the largest of its kind in America. Unfortunately this policy was not continued. The company concluded that printers' ink was no longer necessary to them—that the soap had been so enormously advertised that it would carry itself for the future. The sales began to drop off so slowly that they did not realize their mistake for a long while. Then they made a valiant effort to regain the lost ground. But the mischief had been done, and done irreparably. Even the most extravagant use of the art of publicity failed to bring back the lost sales.

Robert Bonner's Idea of a Small "Ad"

IT MAY be argued that what would apply to such an article as soap would not apply to a more important and serious institution. But that this is not true may be readily shown by any number of instances. One of the most instructive is that furnished by the career of Robert Bonner, in his day probably the most famous publisher in America. Mr. Bonner built up a paper that was known and read everywhere. It made him a millionaire many times over. His success was founded primarily on his bold advertising, and never before nor since has there been such a lavish outlay of money by any publisher. On one occasion he called on James Gordon Bennett, the elder, saying that he wanted to contract for a big advertisement the following day in the New York Herald.

"How much space do you want, Mr. Bonner?"

"As much as you'll sell."

"Oh, I guess not," replied Mr. Bennett with a smile. "We've got lots of space, you know, for our advertisers."

"YOUR RECKLESSNESS IS THE TALK OF THE TOWN"

"That's good," replied the other cheerfully. "Here's copy for one page, and here's copy for another, and here's copy for a third, and here's——"

"Hold on, there, hold on," cried the astonished publisher of the Herald. "Bless my heart, man, we can't give you the whole paper."

"Why," declared Bonner with an injured air, "you told me I could have all I wanted."

"Well, in Heaven's name, how much do you want?"

"Why, I figured on about six pages."

"I'm sorry, but there is a limit, you know, beyond which we can't go and get our paper out; and three pages about marks this limit."

"I'm sorry to hear that. Still if you can't, you can't, and I'll have to be satisfied with a little advertising. But I must say I'm very much disappointed."

A few days after this "little advertising" appeared Mr. Bonner received a call from Henry Ward Beecher, who was then writing for him the novel Norwood, which was appearing in serial form.

"I've come," said Mr. Beecher, "to remonstrate with you against the dreadful way in which you are throwing away your money."

"I? How?"

"Why, through your foolish extravagance in advertising. A dozen men of prominence, friends of yours and friends of mine, have come to me within the last few days, asking me to see you and stop you in your course. Your recklessness is the talk of the town. Everybody is prophesying that you'll be a bankrupt unless you stop."

"Good, good," chuckled Bonner. "That's the very thing. Don't you see that my advertising is a distinct success if it has the effect of making the whole town talk about me? The result will be that the whole town will buy my paper."

And it did. Mr. Beecher went away only half convinced. But it wasn't long before he admitted the wisdom of Mr.

IN THE COURSE OF THE AFTERNOON THERE ENTERED A WOMAN WHO ASKED FOR TWO YARDS OF BLACK VELVETEEN

Bonner's course, convinced by circulation figures that were stupendous for those days. Mr. Bonner retired some years before his death to devote himself to the enjoyment of the large fortune he had accumulated. His successors believed themselves in possession of a property that need no longer be advertised. They felt that, as it was known almost as well as New York itself, it would be "folly to waste money." Something like six or seven years ago the circulation of this great property had dwindled to such an extent that it was no longer deemed wise to continue it as a weekly publication. There were several bursts of tardy advertising, but they failed utterly to revivify this property that had made its founder one of the richest men in America.

The publishers learned by costly experience what is to-day impressed on all advertisers by experts—that you must "keep everlastingly at it" to win and hold success with printers' ink, and that it is a practical impossibility to revivify any property that has been once advertised into great success and then allowed to die down for want of persistent effort.

A Trackless Trolley

TROLLEY cars running independent of tracks, wandering freely over any part of a street or road, and all the time maintaining trolley wheels safely against overhead wires, are now a practical, realized innovation. The danger of the current-collecting attachment falling has been overcome. Moreover, it can be readily applied to the wires or removed at will, or switched from one line to another. Without changing the speed, a car can be guided to the right or left of any object with no more effort than that required in manipulating an auto-motor vehicle. As now constructed, the trackless trolley car can travel on any part of a road or street twenty-five feet in width.

As there are no tracks to construct and equip in this new system, the cost of street-car lines is reduced to a minimum. Two overhead parallel wires supply the current. A tension spring sustains the trolley pole substantially at the height of these wires. Grooved trolley wheels engage the wires laterally instead of perpendicularly, and these wheels are connected with a device constructed on the principle of lazy-tongs made of non-conducting material and provided with springs. The conductor operates the trolley contrivance by means of two pulley ropes. He can easily, by a pull on the ropes, control the movements of the lazy-tongs, and release springs which cause the trolley wheels to fly apart. This brings the trolley cords or ropes against the wires. The conductor then pulls downward, thereby drawing the trolley wheels toward the wires until the latter are brought into engagement with extension arms and thence readily to the grooves of the wheels.

Now the car is ready to proceed. The lazy-tongs are so adjusted that they maintain a necessary constant parallel with the transverse line of the car—in other words, remain at right angles to its course. The extensible character of the lazy-tongs, under the impulsion of springs, keeps the trolley wheels pressed against the wires. In fact, sufficient lateral divergence is provided for in this contrivance to keep the wheels in firm engagement with the wires when the latter are pressed farthest apart midway between their supports.

The conveyance may move along a line parallel with the trolley wires, and at such a distance that the trolley pole stands at an angle to the wires of from seventy-five to eighty degrees. Whatever angle the car takes is followed by the extensible dove-tailed contrivance between the trolley wires.

Street cars traveling at great speed can turn out to avert collisions, and may freely wander at either side of the street or roadway without interruption to the propelling current.

"IT IS right to explain," said the Doctor when it was his turn to confess, "that I seemed from childhood to have had a faculty for materializing an absent person of whom I am thinking, so that those who are present to my spirit are also present in their body. What the body may be in which they become visible I am not going to discuss at present, for that would lead us into one of the most difficult provinces of psychical investigation, and our idea is not conferences, but experiences. Perhaps two instances will be enough to show what I mean and may help to explain the incident I am afterward to tell.

"When I was about nine years old it was thought expedient for some reason or other to take me from the chamber where I slept with my younger brother and to send me to a lonely bedroom on the highest floor, where I had not only the room but the whole floor to myself. The room was large: it had two huge dark cupboards running under the slates, it had an opening by a trap-door to the roof, and I was terrified of the thought of the first night. Of course, I pretended that I was not afraid and that I was awfully glad to have such a jolly big room all to myself, and then, when our old nurse had bid me good-night and I was left alone, I simply sweated with fear for hours, and I longed, as a lad will, for his mother. If she would only come up! But then she would be in bed long ago. I would go down to her, but my father would laugh at me. If I could only let her know without any other person knowing. All this time my eyes were firmly closed for fear of what I might see, and my head buried deep in the pillow and almost covered with bedclothes for fear of what I might hear, when it seemed to me as if I knew that some one was in the room, and I opened my eyes to see my mother standing at the bedside looking at me very kindly. 'How did you know, mother,' I cried, sitting up in bed, 'that I was weary-ing for you?' And then, just as a lantern picture disappears from the sheet, she was gone. Within ten seconds I was out of that room and downstairs battering at the door of the bed-room where my father and mother were sound asleep.

"Twenty years after and when I had begun to practice, I was sitting in my study one Christmas Eve, and my thoughts turned to the dearest friend and the truest I have ever had. I went to medicine and he went into the army where he did splendid work and died gloriously in one of our Indian wars —Mappin, of the Irregular Horse. My mind fixed itself upon him, his look as he used to sit smoking in my room, as he slogged in cricket, as he bade me good-by when he left, and I longed with all my heart that distance were obliterated and that old Jack were beside me again. There was no noise in the room and nothing to make me look round; but I started to my feet as if some one had been announced, and there in the uniform of the Indian Horse, much browner than he used to be, and a little older, with a scar upon his cheek, but with the old gay and careless look, was Jack. 'Wherever did you come from, old man?' I cried joyfully; 'this is a trick to play . . .' But I was alone in the room. No, I know I was not dreaming, for while still standing there the telephone bell rang at my side. Perhaps I ought to add that I did not receive a letter a few weeks afterward saying that Jack had died at that very hour, for he was not killed for some years afterward. It is likely (if that throws any light upon it) that, like my mother, he was sleeping at the time when present to my thoughts he also materialized before my eyes. And now for my experience.

"It was only in his last illness that I attended Jeremiah Wisset, and Jeremiah used to boast that up to that time he had never paid one sixpence to the medical profession, which had secured to him, he explained, two advantages in life: more money and good health. When I saw him first, which was years before he died, he was so thin and dry—a skeleton with a parchment stretched over it—that I do not believe any respectable and enterprising microbe with a sound appetite would have landed on such a creature. He belonged to that class of lean old men who seem to be indefinitely preserved by a drying process, so that there is no reason that they should die any more than a mummy. His practical business in life was operating in lard, and his name on the produce market was a synonym for shrewdness, capacity, courage and hard-ness. By the cunning and daring of his speculations he had upset markets, ruined rivals and made great strokes of suc-cess. Every man has a lighter side, and Jeremiah allowed himself one recreation, and that was the Restoration of the Lost Ten Tribes. He had received, so he would explain when not occupied with lard, special revelations that the Ten Tribes were the Afghans, and he used to confirm this remark-able idea by photographs showing the likeness between the rulers of Afghanistan and distinguished Hebrews, and also by a collection of texts from the Old Testament in which he traced distinct prophetical allusions to the customs and habits of the Afghan people. It may seem incredible that the same man who kept the lard market in a state of perpetual commo-tion was the President of the Afghan Restoration Society; but really every person is mad on some points. You may play upon the instrument for a long time before you touch the false note, but sooner or later it will catch your ear. One of the richest men I know, and one of the most benevolent, thinks he has a glass leg; a very successful barrister believes that he has reached a state of spiritual perfection by the special assistance of Heaven; a clergyman I often meet is convinced that any disorder among his books or papers is brought about by the active interposition of Satan, and a respectable trades-man who has amassed a competency by remnant sales will tell you the date of the end of the world and show you the picture of the General who is to command at the battle of Armageddon. If you ask why gentlemen with such remarkable views are not locked up, I will only reply that most of them are clever enough to lock you up, and if you presume upon their weakness you are very likely to be undeceived. Any one who judged Jeremiah's mental capacity by his views on the Afghan question would have made a mistake, and one or two lard men who subscribed to the Restoration Society and then presumed upon the fact in the market were very badly hurt. Jeremiah kept his relaxation strictly within bounds, and out-side the Afghan he was a silent, reserved, determined, merciless man.

Any affection which he was capable of—and perhaps he had more heart than people knew—had been given to a nephew, of whom he sometimes spoke in moments of rare confidence to old Kinnish, his rival in lard. It was understood that if this lad had fallen in with Jeremiah's wishes he would have been brought into the office and have been made the old man's heir, but the foolish fellow persisted in going into the army, with only one hundred pounds of private income, and remaining in it, and Jeremiah declared to Kinnish that, although Robert was his natural heir, he should leave every penny to the Society for the Restoration of the Afghans. And Kinnish, who knew better than to talk with Jeremiah about the Afghans, took a very dark view of the nephew's chances. Kinnish declared to his cronies at the club that Jeremiah was much fonder of that nephew than he would allow, and that the refusal to join him in business had hit the old man hard. Certainly he began to age visibly and, although he could not get thinner, he got weaker, and when he was stricken down one evening in his room after an exciting day in the city I had no doubt when I saw him that it was the beginning of the end. He lived for about a month in what I may call a state of suspended animation both of mind and body. He could hardly speak, and he never seemed to think of busi-ness; he took as much food as was given him and fell in with any arrangement made for his comfort. The only thing he seemed to care for was to sit at the window of the room where he kept his papers and his books on the great Afghan ques-tion, and to look out of the window as if watching for some one's coming. I asked his nurse whether he ever expressed a wish to see any person, but she said no; and when old Kinnish called, Jeremiah did not seem to know who he was. His nephew was with Kitchener up the Nile, and, a week before Jeremiah's stroke, had been mentioned in the dispatches for a rather plucky action, and a lard man had seen Jeremiah going from paper to paper in the Exchange newsroom with much interest. I asked him whether he would like me to communicate with Lieutenant (now Captain) Stokes, but Jeremiah only looked at me and shook his head; then he resumed his watch at the window. His mind was dazed and I came to the conclusion that he had forgotten everything, but that through his dull consciousness there stirred some affection for his nephew, and that though he did not know it, and made no response if Stokes' name was mentioned, he was feeling after him.

"One night about ten o'clock I was summoned to come in haste, and was not surprised to find Jeremiah had had another shock and that he was dying. He was speechless and help-less, but it appeared as if his mind had wakened and that he desired to say something. His eyes appealed; but it was not for any bodily relief, since the nurse was attending to every want, and I knew that he had no pain. Following as far as one could the signal of his eyes we concluded that he desired something that was not in the room, and I went into his sitting-room and looked for any book which might satisfy him. I brought in turn and held up before him, naming it as I did so, a Bible, one of his Afghan books, a bound volume of produce reports, finally a daily newspaper, believing that in this way we might strike the thought that was in his mind. His desk was locked; but when we asked him if he wished it opened, there was no response in the eyes, and I doubted whether, being the man that he was, he would keep any-thing valuable in a place that could be opened so easily. We mentioned to him clergyman, lawyer, and Peter Kinnish, but the eyes said 'No'; then I said, 'Stokes, your nephew—Lieutenant Stokes,' and his eyes said 'Yes'; it was distinctly his nephew about whom he was thinking, and when I added, for I had forgotten his promotion, 'Captain Stokes,' I saw a flash of satisfaction. He knew that his nephew was in Egypt and could not be brought home in time; for I was now con-vinced that he was absolutely compos mentis. It was there-fore something to do with Stokes that was troubling his mind. Was it a message that he wanted to send? The eyes were not satisfied. Was it some paper that had to do with his nephew? Then I saw that we had struck upon the truth. But Jeremiah was weakening fast and the time was very short. Very likely he wished to make some change in his will: I did not know whether in that state he could legally do so, but at any rate if that was what he desired we ought to do what we could. Again I asked him whether he wanted a lawyer sent for, but that was not his desire. Whether he wished a paper brought? Yes, that was it. Having pro-cured his keys I opened his American desk and began to bring bundle after bundle into the room and lay them on the bed and his eyes looked at me in despair. Not these? No. Not there? No. Where? Then he seemed to make an effort to break the silence and tell us what he wanted and where it was, and the cord of life snapped. He was gone, carrying his secret with him.

"When the time came to settle Jeremiah's affairs his law-yers produced a will which he had made three years before and at the time when his nephew finally decided to remain in the army. By the provisions of this will Stokes received a thousand pounds, certain hospitals received five hundred each, generous provision was made for his clerks and servants, and the remainder of his estate was left to the benefit of the Society for the Restoration of the Lost Ten Tribes—that is to say, the Afghans—to their native country. And there was a special condition that under no circumstances was any portion of this money to go for the benefit of 'those persons calling themselves Anglo-Israelites and pretending that the English nation is the Lost Ten Tribes, which is a delusion.' The will was drawn up with great care, and notwithstanding the Afghan craze there seemed no chance of its being broken. Arrangements were made to realize the estate, and the Afghan Society at once began to look out for a staff of officials, so that if it were impossible to induce any of that turbulent peo-ple to settle in the Holy Land the money might be profitably used in supporting secretaries. No one was surprised at the conditions of the will, but every one was angry that so much good money should be wasted and a fine young soldier be deprived of his heritage. I felt so keenly about the matter myself that I told Kinnish, who was the trustee and who despised the job openly, about Jeremiah's last hour. Both of us searched through his drawers and in every corner of the house to find a more recent will. We both came to the conclusion that if he had changed his mind he would not go to the lawyers, but that he would leave some holograph will, and we were certain that if it revoked the Afghan legacy and left the money to his natural heir the law courts would do all they could to confirm it. But no such document could be found, and Kinnish raged furiously. 'Just think of it, that a man should have made such a pile in lard and have left two hundred and thirty thousand pounds to a gang of crazy cadgers.'

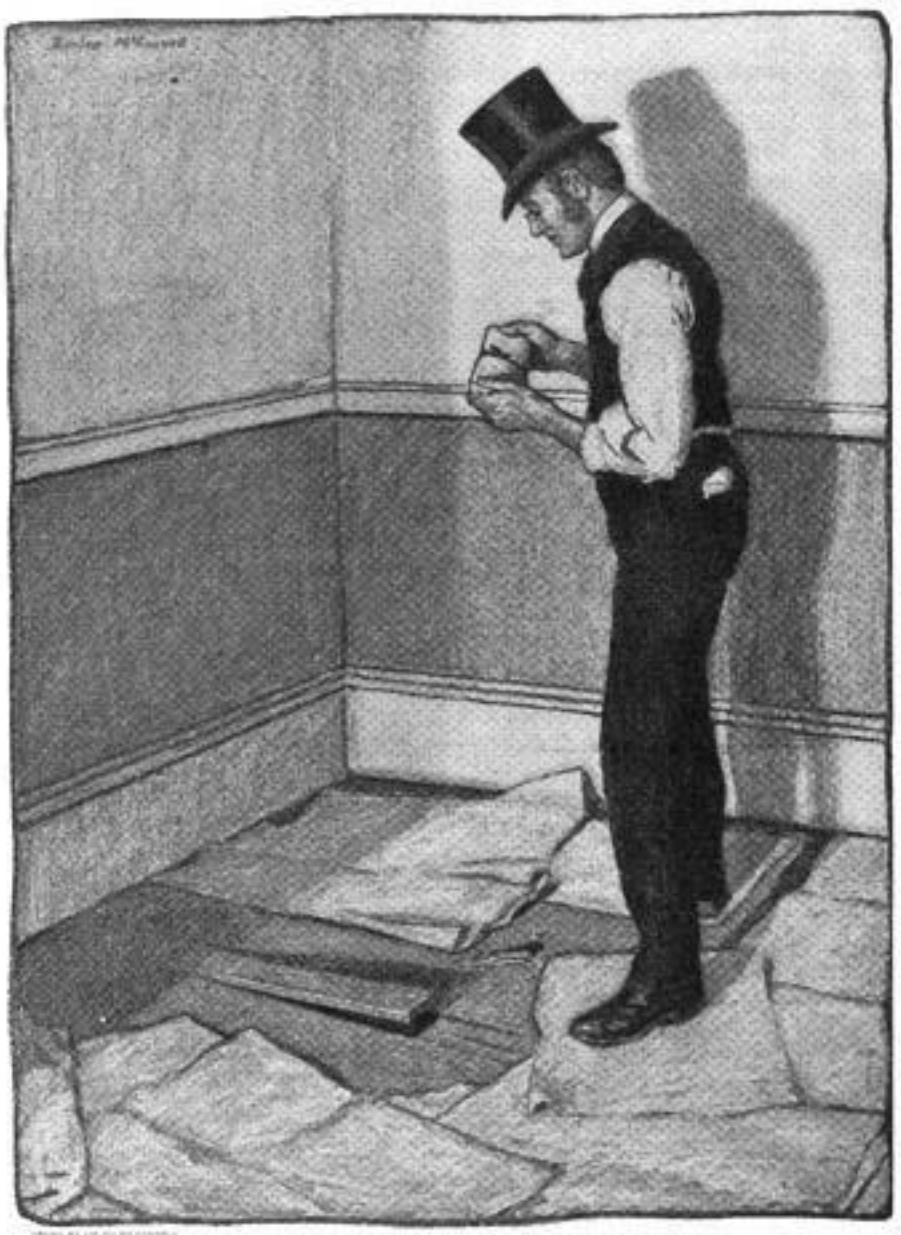
"A month after Wisset's death I had a bad case in his Drive that required me to make a visit every night between ten and eleven o'clock, and I passed Wisset's house as I returned home. The first night I was thinking about my patient and a new medicine which I proposed to try next morning, if there were no improvement during the night, and neither Wisset nor his house came into my mind. Next night I was somewhat relieved about the case and my thoughts were free to turn to Jeremiah. What an agony it must have been if he really had repented him of his anger and had actually restored Stokes to his heritage; if he had been thinking with pride of him during his last moments and had been trying to secure him his rights, and after all had failed, and had died knowing that his fortune would go to those Afghan thieves. It was in its way the most tragic thing that had happened in my practice, and my mind--this, of course, is an important point—was fixed on Wisset and his death. Again I saw him in imagination sitting at the window looking wistfully up the Drive, pleading with his eyes for what he wanted, and then dying at the critical moment. I was now approaching the house and looking at my watch I saw that it was about the time when Wisset died, ten minutes to eleven. His furniture had been sold, the house itself was lying empty till it also should be sold. The blinds were pulled down, the house had that dreary appearance which an empty dwelling always presents—the contrast between a corpse and a living person. One thinks of the fires that have died out, and the light that has been extinguished, and the face which will never look out of the window again, and the hand that will never bid you welcome at the door. No one could say that Jeremiah Wisset was an extremely vital person except in the lard market, or that his greeting as a host was likely to be very enthusiastic; but I had come to judge the old man by that last hour, and to weave a romance of repentance and affection round him. When I looked up at the house I did not expect to see anything except a forsaken house with blinded windows, but in my mind I was replacing Wisset there as I had seen him during the last month of his life.



"Let me now explain that Wisset's house stood a little back from the road, with a small garden in front; that it had three floors, and the middle-floor windows were those of his bedroom and his sitting-room. And there was a dressing-room between, which opened both into the sitting-room and the bedroom, but which Jeremiah never used. On the other side of the road, directly opposite the sitting-room, there was a powerful lamp which lit up the Drive for a considerable distance and flung its light with special strength on the sitting-room window. The moon was under a cloud and there was not much natural light; but the atmosphere was clear, and in the gaslight one saw the sitting-room window, quite distinctly. I stopped and looked at my watch and then I looked up at the window. The whitey-brown blind hung straight and motionless, and then it seemed to me as if it were shaken backward and forward. I went closer to the gate, not that I really thought the blind was being moved, but merely to correct my eyesight. The blind appeared now to be pressed against the glass, and then released. I rubbed my eyes and watched closely, believing that this apparent motion of the blind was some effect of the gaslight; or it might also be a draft in the house, which was empty and all the doors of which were open. I noted, however, that everything was very distinct and that there was no appreciable wind. The blind, after lying quiet for a moment, was now, so far as I could judge—for we are only recording impressions, are we not?—jostled as if some one desired to see out, but could not work the blind. I remembered at that moment that, like many other blinds, that one had been very refractory, and that more than once when it refused to rise the nurse had to roll it up so that Jeremiah might secure his loved view. Of course it was nonsense, I said to myself, but if Jeremiah had been within I should have been certain that they were attempting to set the blind in motion. As it was, I noted in my memory how untrustworthy is our eyesight, how we have only to imagine a thing is moving and it moves, and to think how a thing used to be, and again it is the same.

"After another look at that upper window I was about to leave when . . . what was that? The blind swayed as if one were trying to get a hold of it, and then it was crumpled up at the edge. Where it was pressed together there was something white against the light brown. Could it be? Yes—so far as my eyes served me—and the light was wonderfully clear—it was a human hand, as if some one within, having struggled in vain to get the spring to work or the blind to rise, were now pressing it aside in order to look out. Perhaps you men may feel differently, and of course one could imagine anything more eerie, but personally I do not know anything that would affect my imagination more than what I saw. Consider! An empty house, blinds hanging low on the windows; then, as you are looking, a hand appears upon the blind, only a hand, white, distinct, active. The rest is left to your imagination. Whose hand is it? What is he, or it, doing there? What is going on behind? No doubt a simple explanation lay to hand: a caretaker had been placed in the house, and for some reason wished to pull up the blind. But the hand was not that of a working-woman; it was a man's hand—thin, bony, strong, and, above all, white, very white. Or it might be a burglar had forced an entrance to the house from behind and was ransacking it to find whether Wisset had hidden something away. But burglars don't waste their time on empty houses as a rule, and if they do they would not advertise their presence by pulling up a front window-blind even at eleven P. M. For a moment I thought of climbing over the gate and trying whether I could not get entrance to the house. I looked up at the window again; the hand was gone, the blind was motionless, and then the disappearance affected my imagination more even than the appearance. My courage weakened and I hastened home. As I left the Drive I looked back and saw from an angle Wisset's house with the light of the lamp on that middle floor, and I would have given much to know what was the secret within.

"Next evening I visited my patient as usual, but as I had to go to another case afterward I did not come down the Drive. The following evening I was determined to have another look from the outside at Wisset's house. I arranged to pass there about a quarter to eleven. It was full moon with an almost cloudless sky and the lamps were hardly needed. The Drive was quite still, many of the families were retiring to their bedrooms, and as I came down the road lights were being put out, for the men had to go early to business, and unless there was some social function they went early to bed. When I came to Wisset's gate the house was standing out clear in the moonlight, and there was neither sign of life nor motion. For a minute or two I watched and then began to question whether two nights ago I had not been dreaming dreams. I looked round the quiet and prosaic surroundings of trim villas, neatly-kept gardens, and comfortable middle-class life. In the house opposite the last light went out; it was now eleven o'clock and I turned from the gate on which I had been leaning to go home, when I gave one parting look at the mysterious window, and before my eye, as I stood there on the street in full possession of my senses and with the clear moonlight falling on the house, I saw the blind, after what seemed a brief struggle, go up and at the window in the place where he used to sit—and looking up the Drive—was, so far I as could judge, Jeremiah Wisset himself. Not as he used to sit there, confused and dull, but as he lay in bed before he died, white, wasted, but eager and longing and waiting for some one. None of us have spent much time in describing what we have felt in giving these experiences: we have kept ourselves to what has happened outside of us, but I frankly acknowledge that I gripped the gate-post and was glad of its support. I did not think of going into the house, and indeed at that moment I would not have gone in for a million sterling. My impulse, even though I was outside and safe from any power within that house, was to bolt; but the fascination of the window made me look again, and this time my fear seemed to pass into pity, for the face was so troubled; and then suddenly it disappeared as a person turns from a window to some duty in the room, and I was certain that duty was the quest for what had been lost. The blind came down again and the house was as before, and I went home with a deepened sense of mystery.

"Next morning I sent for the keys of the house under some excuse of looking through it to see whether it would suit a patient, and I determined to ransack it from basement to attic. One has read of the creepy feeling with which people have gone into a haunted house, and one associates anything supernatural with old castles and wainscoted walls and secret doors, and such like dramatic machinery. Nothing could be further removed from the conventional haunted house than Number 27, Albert Drive. It was a middle-class, semi-detached villa, renting for about eighty pounds a year, and containing, as advertisements said, three entertaining rooms, seven bedrooms, two dressing-rooms and necessary kitchen accommodation. It steadied my nerves to run over the house-agent's description as I stood on the doorstep and opened the front door. The interior was, of course, cheerless, dirty, as empty houses are apt to be; and one's footsteps echoed on the uncarpeted floors. The light was shining everywhere and there was nothing about such a house to suggest mystery. Amongst some ingenious Christmas literature I had read of thieves taking possession of an empty house, and then getting up ghost scenes to frighten away intending tenants, and it occurred to me that it was within the bounds of possibility that this had been done in Wisset's house. If so, the gang would be living in the cellars, which were reached by a steep, almost ladder, stair. I brought a serviceable stick with me, but I almost wished that I had added an operating knife as I went down into the semi-darkness of the cellars. There were three—coal cellar, washing-house and a box room, together with the wine cellar—but they were all empty. There was no sign of any squatters. I came upstairs and locked the door of the cellar stairs and went through the rooms on the ground floor, including the kitchen, and made no discovery. Next I made a survey of the third or highest floor, and found nothing there to remark, and then I came to what I may call Wisset's own ground. I looked into two rooms

ON THE fifteenth of April Congress met for one of the most exciting sessions in the history of the country. There was excitement both for the members and for the public. Usually, when great economic questions have to be disposed of, which rack the intelligence of the strongest men in the House and Senate, which make and unmake Presidents and policies, at which men work like slaves toiling at the oar, by night as well as by day, and of which the harvest of death is grimly reckoned beforehand, the people go on quietly, reading with calm indifference the proceedings of Congress in the newspapers or skipping them because of their dullness. When questions arise affecting the honor and prestige of the country, the American people, justly described as "strong, resolute and ofttimes violent," become deeply agitated, are swayed all one way by the same mighty impulse, and force Congress to act as the people wish. The Congress at these times is calm. There is nothing to do but to comply with the mandates of the people. One party is as willing to vote supplies as another. All march together. The march would become a wild storming party but for a few cool heads who act as a brake, and keep the pace down to something reasonable and the policies in the middle of the road. But the brake is powerless to stop the march onward.

At this session, though, there were to be things to agitate both the people and the Congress. The question of peace or war had to be decided; and if it were peace, as the cooler heads foresaw, it would be peace on such stupendous terms of power and prestige to this country that it might be impossible to deal sanely with the great economic problems which were like the rumblings of an earthquake, and were liable to produce vast convulsions. For the present, economic questions were in the background; the Committee on Foreign Relations was the most prominent one in the House and in the Senate.

It almost cured Crane of his infatuation for Washington society to see how little it was impressed by the large events waiting to burst from under the great white dome on the hill. Himself in a fever heat of suppressed excitement, he felt aggrieved that dinners still went on unflaggingly, that the first long season of grand opera Washington had ever known was about to begin, and claimed much attention. None of these smart people seemed to care in the least that he was to present the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations in an unprecedentedly short time—a report which might mean war or peace, accordingly as it might sustain the Administration or not. He expressed his sense of personal injury to Thorndyke as the two sat hard at work in their committee-room one night, a week after the meeting of Congress.

They were quite alone, and it might be said that the report was theirs alone. There were other strong men on the committee, but they had got used to the autocratic rule of Thorndyke, and rather liked it. He consulted them attentively, but he was always the man who acted. The new chairman recognized this, and being ambitious to rule as Thorndyke had ruled, he consulted his predecessor somewhat ostentatiously—at which his colleagues smiled and let him alone. Crane had just experienced an instance of Thorndyke's good will, who was in the act of saving his chairman from making a ridiculous blunder which would have hindered his prospects very much as Oliver Goldsmith's unlucky red coat did for him with the Bishop. The Secretary of State, a very long-headed person in a small way, had previously got the length of the Honorable Julian Crane's foot, as the vulgar express it. He had asked Crane to play golf with him; he had invited the Member from Circleville to little dinners with him.

The Secretary's father had made money, and his daughters were replicas of Lady Clara Vere de Vere. Of his sons, one, a man of some brains and much perseverance, had reached the most highly ornamental position in the Government of the United States—the Secretaryship of State. He maintained it with dignity. He had been brought up in an auriferous atmosphere, totally denied the descendants of Cap'n Ebenezer Crane, who had lost his all in the steamboat business, and spent his last years keeping the Circleville tavern. Crane knew all about this, one of his grandfather's standing quarrels with Fate being that Josh Slater, a durned fool, and a rascal besides, in Cap'n Ebenezer's opinion, had made so much, where a better man—that is, himself—couldn't make a living. But Crane knew better than to refer to any of these matters before the Secretary, who was indeed only dimly acquainted with his father's profession. The Secretary, a polished, scholarly man, was a very good imitation of a statesman. He liked to be called the Premier, prided himself on his resemblance to Lord Salisbury, and dressed the part to perfection. During Thorndyke's chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations, when the present international complication had been brewing, the Secretary had been a good deal annoyed by being summoned to the Capitol on what he considered flimsy pretexts. He determined when Crane succeeded Thorndyke to make a bold stroke, and have the chairman come to him occasionally, on the sly, as it were. To this end he had written Crane a little note beginning, "My dear Crane." In it the Secretary spoke pathetically of his gout, also of his age, and would Crane, on the score of old friendship and the Secretary's many infirmities, come to see him at a certain hour at the Department, and perhaps the necessity might be avoided of the Secretary taking a trip in the changeable weather to the Capitol, which otherwise would be inevitable?

Crane showed this note with ill-concealed pride, and was about to fall into the Secretary's little trap through the telephone, when Thorndyke hastily interposed.

"My dear fellow," said he, grinning, "you had better wait until the Secretary's gout gets better, rather than inaugurate the policy of running up to the State Department to see him, when it is his business to come here to see you. The old fellow tried that game on me, but, in return, I used to get the committee to invite him down here about once a week to give his views on something or other for which we didn't give a tinker's dam, as the Duke of Wellington used to say. But it cured him. He stopped inviting me cordially and informally to come to the State Department to see him."

Crane's face flushed.

"The old sneak!" he cried, and then dashed off a curt note to the Secretary. Thorndyke promptly confiscated this note, and dictated another which was, if anything, more affectionate in tone than the Secretary's. Crane would wish, above all things, to oblige the Secretary, but was himself under the weather, and so forth, and so forth.

"But I played golf with him at seven o'clock this morning!" cried Crane, throwing down his pen.

"So much the better," replied Thorndyke. "You are returning his own lie to him with interest. Go on—'Possibly by to-morrow you may be well enough to comply with the wish of the committee, and come to the Capitol. In any event, before a formal request is made for your attendance, your convenience will be consulted with regard to the hours and the weather.' And when you get him up here put him in the sweat-box and give him all that's coming to him—that's the way to get on with him."

"I see," said Crane, light breaking upon him; "and when you had the old fellow up here, and I thought you were so friendly and polite to him, you were just 'sweating' him."

"That's what I was doing. However, I reckon the present Secretary to be the ideal man for the place. He is highly ornamental, perfectly honest, and satisfied with the shadow of power. Occasionally he reaches out for something in the way of etiquette or attention—as in the present case—but when he doesn't get it he subsides quietly. The State Department has been steadily losing power and prestige from the foundation of the Government until now, when it is recognized as a mere clerical bureau and a useful social adjunct to the Administration. Do you think if Daniel Webster were alive to-day he would take the portfolio of State? He would see the Administration to the demnition bowwows first. Mr. Blaine took it twice under compulsion, and was the most wretched and restless man on earth while he had it. Both times he was so much too big for the place that he became exceedingly dangerous, and had to be forced out each time to save the Administration from total wreck. The lesson has not been lost on succeeding Presidents, and there will be no more Blaines and Websters in the Cabinet, anywhere at all. The trouble is, however, that foreign Chancelleries persist in taking the State Department seriously. They can't take in that you, as chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Relations, are of a good deal more consequence at present than the Secretary of State. You can send for him, but he can't send for you. You can call for information from him and practically force him to give it to you, but he can't make you tell the day of the week unless you want to."

Crane, who had signed and sealed his note while Thorndyke was speaking, glowed with pleasure at the last words. But he returned to his grievance about none of the smart set taking any interest in what was to happen on the morrow.

"The diplomatic people are taking the deepest interest in it," replied Thorndyke grimly, "and when this report is read to-morrow they will be up against a fierce proposition." Thorndyke was not above using slang when in the company of men alone.

They fell to work again at some last details, and it was not far from midnight when they left the great white building on the hill. In spite of the engrossing matters which had employed them both men had been haunted by the recollection of their conversation the night before, about Constance Maitland—but neither had spoken her name. Thorndyke said, as they came out on the deserted moonlit plaza:

"It's a pity Mrs. Crane can't be here to listen to you speak to-morrow."

"Yes," replied Crane promptly. "But I have written her about it, and I shall send her a dispatch as soon as I get through to-morrow. By the way, I sent Miss Maitland a ticket to the reserve gallery. I shall probably see her at the British Embassy, where I am going to take a look at the hall."

It was Crane's first invitation to the British Embassy, and he was slightly elated at it, and being unable to conceal anything Thorndyke saw his elation. His only reply to Crane's important communication was, "Good-night—here's my car." And he jumped aboard the trailer just passing.

When he reached his own door he turned away from it. The night was growing more enchantingly lovely every hour. A great white April moon was riding high in the heavens, and the soft freshness of the spring was in the air. Thorndyke made the beauty of the night an excuse to himself for remaining out-of-doors. In truth, he had felt a yearning ever since Crane had first told him that Constance Maitland was in Washington, to see her habitation—it was next to seeing her. He struggled against it for an hour or two, walking away from the street wherein she dwelt. He soon found himself in the poorer part of Washington, a long way from the gay quarters—a part of narrow brick or frame houses, cheap churches and many small shops. He was reminded of that saying, as old as Plato, who did not himself say it first: "In all cities there are two cities—the city of the poor and the city of the rich." The city of the poor in Washington, however, is the least disheartening of its sort in the world—for even the poorest house has air and space and sunlight about it and green trees to shelter it.

After having wandered about until he felt certain the West End was asleep, Thorndyke yielded to the overmastering impulse and set out for his goal at the other end of the town. He soon entered Massachusetts Avenue—that long and beautiful avenue, shaded with double rows of lindens, their pale green buds breaking out into their first delicate leaf, the vista broken by open spaces with statues, and closing with the rich foliage of Dupont Circle. All was quiet, silent and more and more brightly moonlit. No glaring gas lamps marred the light or darkness of the perfect night—for in Washington, when the moon shines, the gas lamps don't shine.

Thorndyke's soul, dragging his unwilling feet, brought him to one of the pretty side streets opening upon the splendid Avenue. It was here that Constance Maitland's house was.

Thorndyke believed—such is the folly of love—he would have known the house even if Crane had not mentioned the number. But the number was conclusive. It was an old-fashioned house, broad and low for a city house. It had been the advance-guard of fashion. There was a little strip of garden and shrubbery at the side, where clipped cedars were formally set, and three great lilac bushes were hastening into a bloom of purple splendor. The scent of the lilacs brought back the terrace on Lake Como, where lilacs also grew, and where he and Constance had spent those glowing and unforgotten hours—and by moonlight they had often sung together the old duet from Don Pasquale, Oh, April Night! Thorndyke, entranced and lost in visions, began to hum the old, old air. What strange power of restoring the past have old songs and the perfume of flowers long remembered! Thorndyke felt as in a dream—all the intervening years melted away—it was once more Como, with its moonlight, its flowers, its songs, its loves—and then, he looked up and saw Constance Maitland standing before him.

She had just returned from the ball—the carriage from which she had alighted was rolling off. As she met Thorndyke face to face on the sidewalk she started slightly, and her long white mantle slipped from her delicate bare shoulders to the ground. Her eyes met Thorndyke's—everything was in that gaze except surprise. When two people think of each other daily for many years the strangeness is not in their meeting, but in their separation. They had seen each other last on a moonlit night, and the sweet scent of lilacs was in the air—and now, after eighteen years, it was so alike!

The moonlight was merciful to them both. Neither saw all of Time's earmarks—Thorndyke saw none at all in Constance. Her girlish figure was quite unchanged. Her pale yellow ball gown, the pearls around her throat, were youthfulness itself. She had never been remarkable for beauty, but her face showed no lines, her silky black hair, simply arranged, revealed none of the silver strands that were visible by daylight. Thorndyke received a distinct shock at her youthfulness. It was his lost Constance of the Villa Flora.

She held her hand out to him without a word, and he clasped it. In that clasp Constance realized that she had all and more of her old power over him. Thorndyke could not have said a word at first to save his life, but Constance, with equal feeling, had a woman's glibness, and could have plunged into commonplaces on the spot. But she refrained, knowing that her silence was eloquent. She withdrew her hand lingeringly. Then Thorndyke saw the white cloak lying on the ground. He picked it up and held it wide for Constance, and when he enfolded her in the cloak she was enfolded for one thrilling, perilous instant in his arms. Another moment and she would be at his mercy. Constance, knowing this, suddenly remembering the maid waiting for her and possibly belated neighbors looking out of their windows, withdrew a little. This restored Thorndyke's vagrant senses, and after a moment or two he said:

"It does not seem—now—so long since we parted."

"It is very long—it is nearly eighteen years," Constance replied. Her voice was the sweet voice of the far South, for her young eyes had first opened upon the blue waters of another lake than Como—Lake Pontchartrain. In her speech there were continual traces of her Louisiana birth—Thorndyke had ever thought her voice and her little mannerisms of language among her greatest charms—and he was confirmed in his belief at the first word she uttered. He said to her:

"I did not know until yesterday that you were in Washington."

"I did not like to send you a card," Constance replied.

"You might have done so much."

"I don't know which of us is in the wrong," she said—said it so deliberately that it might convey a thousand meanings. "But if you are waiting for me to ask you—come. Of course, I can't ask you in now—if we were as young as we once were, it would be quite dreadful for us to be standing and talking as we are—but both being old enough to take care of ourselves, we have our liberty."

Love and hate are closely allied, and often reason alike from the same premises. As Thorndyke realized more and more that Constance Maitland still had power to disturb him mightily he resented her ease and tranquillity—and conscious of the lines in his face, conscious that he was growing bald, he felt injured at her continuing youth. Evidently, the recollections which had made him forswear love, forego wealth, and had turned him into a Congressional drudge had left no mark on her. He took, at once, her hint to leave her.

"If you will give me your key," he said stiffly.

Constance handed it to him; he went up the steps and opened the door. The gaslight fell full upon her, and it was as if with every glance they became more infatuated with each other and found it harder to part.

"To-morrow," said Thorndyke.

"Yes—to-morrow," Constance echoed dreamily.

Thorndyke banged the door to and literally ran down the street.

When he came to himself, as it were, he was in his own room, smoking. He kept on saying to himself, "To-morrow—to-morrow," and then called himself a fool—a purely academic proceeding, however, which never really influences any issue between a man and his will. When, at last, he went to bed the sky was opalescent with the coming dawn. After four hours of sleep he waked with the uncomfortable feeling which waits on excess in everything, especially excess in the emotions after one is forty years of age. The tumults of youth are killing after forty.

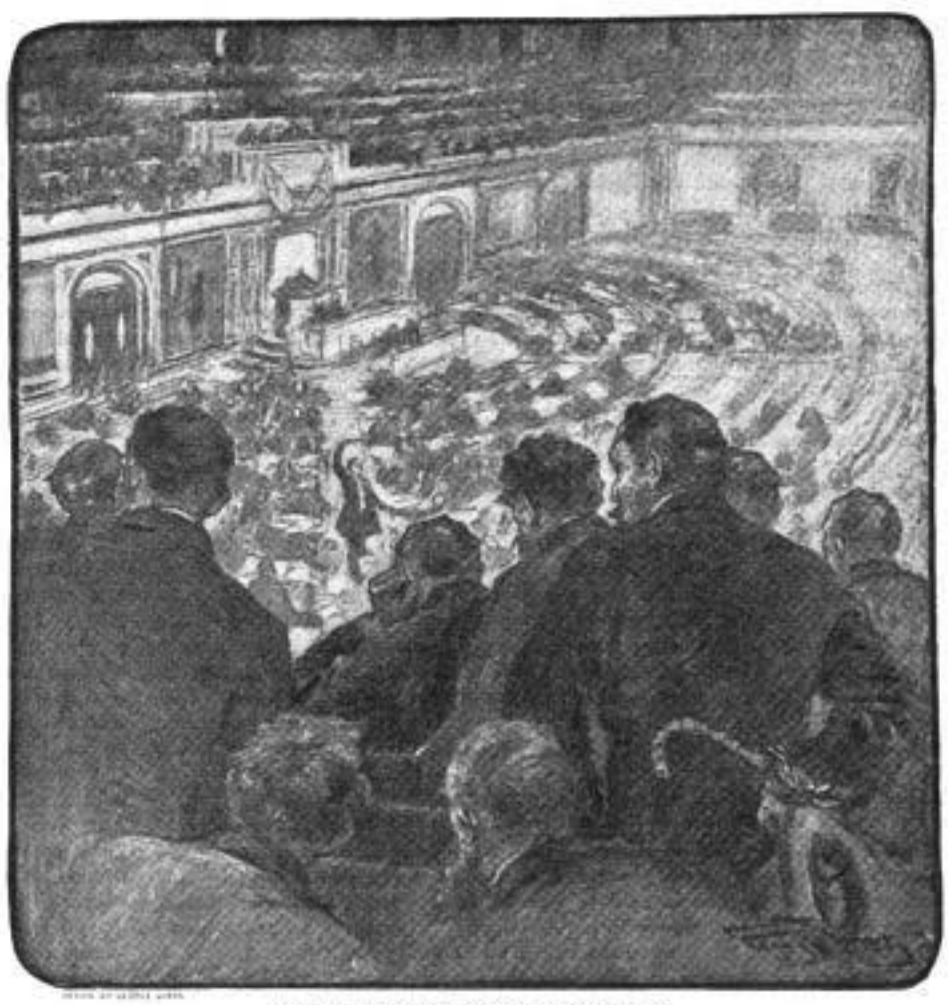
He got through with his breakfast and his mail under the disadvantages of seeing visions of Constance Maitland floating all about him—visions of Constance offering to give up her fortune and live with him on what he could save of his Congressional salary after supplying the wants of his crippled sister, Elizabeth. And in case he should lose the nomination at the hands of his boss, as he had once done—there would be nothing at all for Constance or Elizabeth, either, nor for himself that he could even foresee. What a strange infatuation was Congressional life! It was almost as strange as the infatuation for a woman forever barred from him—and by the worst luck in the world, he, Geoffrey Thorndyke, was the victim of both!

These unpleasant thoughts walked every step of the way with him to the Capitol on that bright April morning. When he reached the great white building, sitting majestically on the hill, he was one of a vast multitude of people surging toward the south wing. It still lacked half an hour of twelve, and the flag was not yet hoisted. Crowds were disembarking from the street cars, the plaza was black with carriages, and over all was that tension of feeling which communicates itself to thousands and tens of thousands of persons at once. Something was about to happen that day in the House of Representatives. As Crane said, the smart set cared nothing for it, but their majesties, the people, were deeply interested in it, and had every reason to be, and assembled in great crowds to see the first act. Thorndyke made his way to his committee-room. No one was there except Crane. The gentleman from Circleville was dressed for his first appearance as a star. Thorndyke, being in rather a savage humor, thought he had never seen Crane so overdressed, so full of elation and vain simplicity, and, in short, so nearly a fool. In this he did Crane great injustice, for Crane never was, at any time, in the category of fools, although he often did foolish things.

He spoke to Thorndyke affably, although with a slight air of superiority, holding in his hand the report of which Thorndyke had supplied the most effective part—the close reasoning, the conclusive logic, the historical precedents and the invincible moderation. Thorndyke might indeed have said of that report, "All of this I saw—most of this I was." And in the debate that might follow Thorndyke would be obliged to take care of Crane—for Crane, although a powerful and attractive speaker, was easily disconcerted when on his feet, and had a tendency to panic under the enfilading fire of debate. Thorndyke was not an orator in the popular sense, but when it came to having all his wits about him, to defending his position, to hold incursions into the enemy's territory, he was not surpassed by any man in the House.

As his colleagues said of him, he always went documented, and carried concealed parliamentary weapons about his person.

By way of revenge, Thorndyke began to chaff his colleague on the subject of his dress. Crane's shirt-bosom snapped like giant crackers, his cuffs rattled, his collar creaked. He was conscious of this, and glowered darkly at Thorndyke's jokes. Thorndyke's clothes, in contradistinction to Crane's, were the clothes of a clothes-wearing man. They were neither old nor new, neither out of the fashion nor conspicuously in the fashion—they were, in short, the clothes of a man whose father before him had worn clothes.



Both men were in their seats, which were near together, when the Speaker's gavel fell. The galleries were packed, the corridors jammed. In the diplomatic gallery every seat was occupied. The bright costumes of the Orientals and the flower-decked spring hats of the ladies made it gay. The gallery reserved for the President's family and the Cabinet families was also full. So great was the pressure that the motion was at once made to admit ladies to the floor of the House. They came fluttering in like a flock of pigeons, and soon filled all the space back of the desks. They were not, in general, of the smart set, who, as Crane complained, were like Gallio, and cared for none of these things—but were chiefly of official families.

As soon as the prayer and some routine business were over the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations was called for. The calling of the roll had been waived—it was easy enough to see that every member was present who could get there, as well as many Senators. When the report was handed to the reading clerk there was a deep pause. Thorndyke looked at Crane. He was very pale, but the veins in his neck were pulsating strongly. He glanced up at the reserved gallery at the side, and his face flushed deeply. Thorndyke followed his eye. It fell upon Constance Maitland sitting in the front row. She was dressed in a rich black toilette which contrasted strongly with the brilliant colors around her. A delicate black tulle hat sat upon her graceful head, and she fanned herself slowly with a large black fan.

Her distinction of appearance was extreme, and she showed her perfect knowledge of it by the simple but effective trick of wearing black when there was a riot of color around her. By means of a good figure and perfect dressing this seduced the world into thinking her far handsomer than she really was. Thorndyke recognized that when he saw how much more attention she attracted than much younger and more beautiful women.

But then the silence was broken by the great, bell-like voice of the reading clerk reading the report. As the clerk

The Absent-Minded Beggar

BETWEEN nine and ten o'clock the other morning a man had the following experiences:

He received a letter from an acquaintance about a rather important business matter—but the letter had been misdirected, and the delay cost him a considerable sum of money.

Two papers were delivered from a near-by news-stand—but they were not of the dates he had ordered.

His butler told him that a Mr. Wilson wished to see him, and as he did not wish to see the only Mr. Wilson he remembered knowing he told the butler to send Mr. Wilson away—but he afterward learned that by failing to see his caller he had missed something greatly to his advantage and that the name given to his butler was not Wilson but Winston.

He had asked for boiled eggs for breakfast and he got an omelette.

A suit of clothes arrived—and the tailor had cut the trousers three inches too short.

He himself sent off a note—and addressed it to the wrong number and the wrong street.

This is a slightly exaggerated picture of what is happening to everybody everywhere all the time. Wherever there are human beings there you will find a very large part—often more than half—of the routine of life taken up with making wholly avoidable mistakes and correcting them. And in this state of affairs lies another answer to the ever-recurring question, Why do some men get on so much better than others who seem to have just as good minds?

Why? Because the men who get on have the power of giving attention while the other men have not.

The power of giving attention is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, powers of the human mind—next, of course, to the fundamental faculties which enable a man to be called sane. He who possesses it will outstrip any man, no matter how clever, who has it not. The lack of it explains almost all failures; the possession of it is the principal part of almost all—perhaps all—successes. Yet it is one of the humble faculties. It is one that began to develop away back there when the animal kingdom was just waking up to the fact that to get food there is a better plan than waiting for it to be drifted by the air or the ocean into the mouth. It is one that can be easily and quickly cultivated in almost any child.

It simply means to read carefully each and every report that is brought to one by his senses. If you are looking, see what your eyes reveal; if you are hearing, listen to what your ears relate; if you are feeling, tasting, smelling, give whichever it is the courtesy of your attention. Most people can remember—if they attend. The trouble is lack of attention.

Robert Houdin, probably the greatest prestidigitator of modern times, won a reputation for practicing the black art by cultivating this power. He became so expert at seeing what his eyes saw that from a glimpse into a crowded show window as he walked along the street he could name two-thirds of the articles in it. J. Pierpont Morgan has cultivated this power to such an extent that by glancing from page to page of a complex report he can lay his finger on the weak spot in the property which the report describes—or in the report itself. But illustrations and instances are innumerable. Every biography, every history is crowded with them. Every work of constructive genius in finance, commerce, politics or art is an illustration and an instance—and so is every well-ordered life, every well-kept shop, every competent servant.

To realize this power test yourself—or better still, your friend—for when one tests one's self vanity and self-excuse usually prevent results of much value. Begin an important statement or a promising story; let something interrupt you; note whether your friend, who ought to have been, and probably was interested, goes back to the point before the interruption and asks for the rest. Question him on some exciting story in the current news and see how far wrong he has read the newspaper reports of it—which he is probably denouncing for inaccuracy. Test him on large matters and small, and when you shall have done you will probably know why he is succeeding or failing in life.

No one is too old to begin to give attention, but the best time is in youth, in childhood. Not a school day should pass without the teacher cultivating this power in her pupils' minds by asking them to tell or write out what they saw on the way to school, or something of the kind. And no parent who wishes to do his or her duty by the children should neglect to develop and to encourage—in childhood it needs little more than encouragement—this power of accuracy and quickness, but especially accuracy, in reading the reports of the senses.

There are, beyond question, large differences between various human minds in strength and capacity. But the greater part of the width of the gap between bright and stupid is not in the height of the bright above the normal but in the depth of the stupid below it. Some day we may learn that mental sluggishness is as curable as physical sluggishness—if taken in time and treated intelligently.

It is the door carelessly left open, the watch or pocketbook carelessly exposed, that makes the opportunity for the thief. It is the business carelessly conducted, the railway carelessly managed that makes the opportunity for the "Captain of Industry." It is the government carelessly administered that makes the opportunity for—for the rascal that's out to oust the rascal that's in.

And every man who habitually makes a multitude of mistakes of carelessness began his career of alternate catastrophe when, a boy, he only half saw what was put before his eyes, only half heard what was put into his ears.

The Increase of the Well-to-Do

ONE of the interesting facts of the past year was the large number of estates yielding fortunes to new owners. Several hundred Americans died leaving millions to their heirs. More than a thousand left hundreds of thousands of dollars. In England more than two hundred left estates valued at over $300,000,000, or more than $500,000 each, five of them being over five millions each and seventy-six being over a million each.

It is always impossible correctly to find a man's wealth during his lifetime. He will not tell and others cannot guess. But when his money reaches the courts the amount is public property. Gradually legislation is getting a larger share of the big fortunes for public purposes. Thus in England last year the death duties aggregated $100,000,000. The duties in this country vary in the different States, but they gather in quite a sum and the disposition is to increase them. One American plutocrat paid taxes on $700,000 and when he died he left $70,000,000. It was only when his estate came into the courts that the State got a chance to get a share of it—and even then the heirs fought the tax bitterly.

In these enormous figures the main interest is the proof of the rapid multiplication of well-to-do families. We do not say rich, for in these days riches are comparative. One American is said to be worth a thousand millions; quite a number are worth hundreds of millions, and naturally these look down upon the man who has only a million. In fact, a millionaire in New York nowadays is something of a nonentity. And, of course, the many who have only hundreds of thousands are not worth mentioning when real wealth is being discussed. They do not even get their names in the papers.

But it is plain from the returns that there is in the English-speaking races of to-day a very large population of families whose regular incomes range from $25,000 to millions. There are enough of these to explain a great many things. We have been surprised of late by the remarkable prices brought by treasures in art, sculpture and old books. We sometimes express surprise that there is such a wide market and such quick buying for the finest products of artisanship. The demand for the highest and the best is booming. It seems easy to explain it by saying that rich persons are throwing their money away. But that is neither truth nor explanation.

In these new conditions are fruitful promises for excellence. Money cannot paint pictures, but it can make the rewards of the painter opulent beyond all precedent. It can support a higher grade of art, of literature, of bookmaking, of periodical production, of every kind of effort and enterprise which involve genius, talent, brains, skill and experience. In this respect the increase of the well-to-do opens prospects for the artistic that surpass anything the world has ever known. For these fortunate people will have beautiful homes and beautiful things to put in their homes and beautiful books to read. It is, indeed, the true golden age.

Score One for the Baby

AT LAST some one has come to the defense of the baby. In the past, millions of laws and ordinances, statutes and regulations have been enacted by various bodies of wiseacres covering every known field of human endeavor from bananas to Canada thistles, from drain pipes to gold mines, but not until the dawn of the twentieth century did the baby come into its own.

Cleveland has the honor of giving to a grateful world the children's champion. In that city, as in every other embryo metropolis of the country, the iron heel of landlordism was constructively fixed upon the tender neck of the rising generation—until a fortnight ago, when up rose an alderman in the city council with an ordinance which carried fines and imprisonments, pains and penalties, for any landlord or renting agent of any residence property who dared to debar a prospective tenant because the home-seeker had aided in his humble way to swell the national census. If that ordinance becomes a law the haughty landlord must haul in his "No Children" sign and lay in an extra supply of window-glass and varnish to repair expected ravages. The alderman explained to the amazed and admiring council that he has eight sturdy young Americans of his own, and is tired of hiding them from ferocious janitors and suspicious agents when he wants to revel in the great American prerogative of May moving.

Now that the first blow has been struck the battle for the baby should be carried on until it becomes a national movement that Congress may take cognizance of. On the one hand we have President Roosevelt painting pen pictures of race suicide and clamoring for the good old days when every family dinner-table had to have three leaves in it to accommodate the gathering. On the other hand are the owners and renting agents of the apartment houses, which are so rapidly supplanting single residences in the large cities, setting a determined face against the entry of families with children. They think far more of their paint and varnish than they do of "race suicide" or any kindred topic. For years this warfare has gone on while the luckless couple unfortunate enough to have a little treasure or two have been obliged to sneak their loved ones into the flat buildings in barrels and bundles when the janitor was not looking and take them out for brief airings under cover of the friendly darkness at night.

But now that the Cleveland alderman with the large and interesting family has fired the shot which will be heard around the world, aldermanic bodies all over the country may be expected to rally to the standard of the baby and overthrow the hosts of oppression wherever their black flag may be raised.

The Rage for Writing

THERE never has been a time when the young people of this country betook themselves to authorship with such zeal as now. The editor of every magazine between the seas can certify to the truth of this statement. They are overslaughed with tons of manuscript—poems, essays and stories, written by boys and sweet girl-graduates who do not write because they have anything to say but because they need money and are dazzled by the success of other young people who did have something to say. The enormous sales of one or two historical novels, especially, have bewildered them.

There is not an event in our short history that has not been misstated in their imitations of these fortunate books, nor an American hero, from Henty with the Iron Hand to Admiral Dewey, whom they have not apotheosized and bedecked with impossible virtues. The books as a rule have been failures.

We have a suggestion to make to these unlucky authors. They have found how difficult it is to describe a period and events of which they know nothing. The young man who undertakes to tell you of an incident in the Revolution or the Civil War, and of Washington or Lincoln, will unconsciously make a dozen mistakes. But nothing can be easier than to write of his own town and acquaintances. If he sets down from day to day what he sees, let us say of the doings of the trades unions, his picture will be correct and vivid, and forty years hence of great significance and value.

There is a drowsy old town in France in which is a dusty museum containing stuffed alligators and other worthless trash. But in one room is a long yellow strip of canvas stretched around a frame on which uncouth figures have been worked with infinite patience. It is the story of the conquest of England by the Normans, stitched into the cloth by the Norman women at the very time when the deed was being done. There are facts told there which never were kept for us in writing or tradition. The tapestry is of little value as a work of art. But it is true. The Norman Matilda could not write books. She took her needle and with her red and blue crewels made a picture of the things she saw, and the picture has remained, for nearly a thousand years, an invaluable history.

SINFUL PECK

A WHOLE SECOND MATE

BY MORGAN ROBERTSON

HE WAS a huge, loose-jointed and big-fisted man-and-brother, with a countenance positively beautiful in its picturesque ugliness. It was a shade or two darker than coal, deeply pitted with pockmarks, and held a strange combination of good humor and ferocity. Over the gleaming eyes was a perpetual scowl, but the thick lips seldom hid the yellow teeth within, and his moist and expansive smile was nearly as fixed as his scowl. One front tooth was gone, and through the aperture, even when his smile was largest, he could whistle spirited music of quite a good quality, and as he whistled, his feet, large and heavily shod, would shuffle spasmodically, as though in repressed sympathy with the music. He came off to the ship in time for breakfast, and, carrying his dunnage in one hand, climbed a single rope and scrambled over the rail with an agility seldom displayed by men of his size; then, squinting aloft with seamanly scrutiny, he advanced to the Captain, who had emerged from the companion.

"I'se come aboard, Cappen Jackson," he said, smiling benignly.

"So I see, Mr. Johnson," answered the Captain; "and I see you've brought the Articles of War with you." He glanced at a pistol and pair of brass knuckles strapped to the outside of the heavy satchel in the hand of the other.

"Yes, sah; I allus pack 'em outside when I join a new ship, sah. Shows de men wha' dey gwine to get 'f dey don' watch out." His smile grew in dimensions.

"Well, that's all right — I need a good second mate; for I've got a crowd forrard that'll take 'em away from you and jam them down your throat if you don't watch out. But you might as well start right, as you only go to Manila with us. There's a new law passed this year which forbids all form of assault, and also makes me liable for damages in case I permit the escape of an officer who is liable to arrest. So, don't touch a man here unless in self-defense."

"Why — how, Cappen," asked the second mate in wonder — "how you gwine to keep men at work 'less you t'ump 'em round a bit?"

"The Lord knows," answered the Captain, a shade of anxiety clouding his face. "Twelve o' my men'll stand anything. They're dock-rats and hobos shanghaied out o' New York, and have just learned to get out o' their own way. The rest are a baker's dozen o' Lake sailors, old men now, but able and intelligent, seamen to the last man-jack o' them, and regular helyons if you rouse 'em. Mr. Peck was one o' them, but he saved my life outside, and I took him aft as acting mate until the other two get out o' the hospital.

"By the way, are you a navigator?" added the Captain as an afterthought.

"No, sah, but I'se a whole second mate."

"Well, we'll get along, no doubt — but I want to tell you about these men, so you'll know what you're up against. They took charge outside here, and tied us all down; then they threatened to sail the ship back to New York unless I agreed to pay them off at Singapore and send 'em home like gentlemen. Well, I agreed, and did my part; but they chose to wait around Singapore to get a salvage job settled in court, went broke, starved a while, and yesterday signed with me again as there were no other ships in port for them and no other sailors for me. So, there you are. They'll come aboard much disgruntled, I s'pose, but if you're a little careful with 'em there may be no trouble. Don't stir them up needlessly."

"No, sah, not 'less dey needs it," said the negro, beaming joyously. "Jess de same, sah, I nebber seen no crowd dat could down me."

"Well, I've warned you. Here's Mr. Peck — Sinful Peck they called him forrard. He's a rare little man in his way. He can show you your room, and I'll go ashore for the men."

Sinful Peck came out of the cabin, waddling a little in his walk from a growing rotundity due, no doubt, to late immunity from manual labor and to the excellence of the cabin fare, but rather unbecoming to one of his short stature. His round, cheerful face lit up in surprise as he viewed the negro; but he accepted the introduction gracefully, and when the Captain had descended the side to a waiting sampan he led him to his room, and then to breakfast. He watched him a few moments while he rolled up his shirt-sleeves, squared himself at the table, and began shoveling in the remnants of the breakfast with a tablespoon; then, with a grimace of disgust, he returned to the deck.

"Might as well be 'fore the mast with the crowd," he muttered, "as aft with that pig. 'Mister Johnson' — well, I'll be ——." He leaned against the rail and his face grew thoughtful. "And yet, what's wrong with him? Muscular, massive, ferocious — the incarnation of American buckoism, brute strength, seamanship, ignorance and stupidity. Great Scott, what development! He could shut his hand on any of the crowd — and they punched and kicked and insulted me all the way out. Let's think. What'd the skipper ship that brute for? Can I use 'Mistah Johnsing' in my business?"

"LE' GO," HE GASPED. "LE' GO O' ME!"

Long and earnestly he mused, looking abstractedly at the men forward enjoying their post-breakfast smoke, and when the tinkle of eight bells sounded from the cabin clock a smile had come to his face and a mischievous twinkle to his eye, but as he started forward to turn the men to he felt a grip on his collar; then, squirming and choking, he was lifted wriggling from the deck at the end of the negro's long, powerful arm.

"Le' go," he gasped. "Le' go o' me! What's this for?"

"Dat's all right, Misser Peck," said the negro. "I jess want to 'press you wi' my quality 'fore I turn to. I allus makes first mates understand at de beginning dat I'se a mons'ous strong man and won't stand no foolin'. So, you see? Dah." He gave Sinful a shake.

But Sinful, though fat, was agile. He twisted suddenly in midair, doubled one short leg, and planted his foot on the negro's face; then he exerted his strength and landed on his back a few feet away, while the astonished assailant staggered back, rubbing some deep scratches on his face. But he smiled approvingly at his angry superior.

"By golly, Misser Peck," he said, "but you's a smart man. Nobody nebber kicked me in de face before. Hol' on; don' shoot, Misser Peck."

Sinful, with blazing eyes, had arisen with a drawn revolver, and covered him.

"Don't you ever dare to lay your hands on me again," he stormed, "or I'll lay you dead on the deck. What do you mean by it?"

"It's all right, Misser Peck. Put de gun down. I'se got one in my pocket, too, but I don' want to use it. I shot a first mate in Savannah one time, an' I had to go to chokey. It took six p'licemen, by golly."

"It won't need but one and a wheelbarrow if you touch me again."

Sinful lowered the pistol.

"What did you do it for?"

"Jess to show you, Misser Peck, dat I'se de right kind of a second mate for you. De Cappen says dey's a mighty bad crowd o' men comin'!"

"Oh — yes — that's so." Sinful pocketed the pistol, but watched cautiously as he continued. "There are thirteen more — all scrappers. You'll have enough to do to protect yourself without impressing me with your strength. Big Pig Monahan can do you up in one round."

"He can?" said the negro, his eyes gleaming. "Did he say so?"

"No, but you'll know him. He's down on all colored men. He's got a cro'-jack eye and a mild way o' talking; but look out."

"Is he de wussest o' de gang, sah?"

"Almost. There's Seldom Helward — hooked nose, bicycle face, red hair turning gray. Look out for him. Tosser Galvin is another bad one. He's a big, beefy fellow — looks like a butcher. These three love a fight, but the others'll drop in when its started."

"Yay — yah-ya-ha," laughed the second mate, shuffling his feet and waving his long arms in the air. "Dat's de kind o' men I jess love. But say, Misser Peck, ain't dem funny names?"

"They've all got 'em. There's Poop-Deck Cahill, and there's Gunner Meagher, and Ghost O'Brien, Yampaw Gallegher, Turkey Twain, Sorry Welch, Shiner O'Toole, Senator Sands, Jump Black and Moccassey Gill. Now, go forward and start the men to work. Get that water-laid hawser out of the 'tween deck and coil it 'longside the fore hatch; and, by the way, those are good-tempered, willing men forward, there. They don't need thumping."

"Aye, aye, sah; I'll wait for de bad ones," answered the negro, turning away; "but say, Misser Peck," he added, coming back with doubt in his face, "de Cappen he say somethin' 'bout a new law dat you mus' not hit a sailor. How 'bout dat?"

"Oh, there's a fool law passed," said Sinful airily, "but it can't be enforced. Even though you should be arrested when you get to port, all you need is to demand a jury trial and get a change of venue; then by the time the case is called the witnesses 'll be all off to sea again. Can't convict you without witnesses, you know."

"Is dat so, now? By golly, you's a mighty smart man, Misser Peck. How you learn all dis?"

"I've been a lawyer in my time. Don't be alarmed. I'll see you clear of all proceedings, but I expect you to help me keep this crew down."

"Yes, sah. I'll do that, sah. I stand by you, and you stand by me."

"It begins to look," muttered Sinful, as his brother officer went forward, "like hot times for the crowd. Big Pig won't be a lunch for him. But I've got to keep the nigger clear. I'll read up a bit."

He went to his room, searched it well, and emerging with a puzzled face, went forward and searched an empty bunk in the forecastle. Then he directed the men to find and return to him a law book which he must have left behind when he moved his dunnage out of the forecastle.

"Haven't seen it," he said, "sin e the first o' the passage out. So it must be forward." The men promised to find it; but by the time the hawser was on deck a tug had steamed up to the quarter, and their services were required in making her fast. Then Captain Jackson climbed aboard, followed by thirteen gloomy-faced men in seedy disarray — their clothing wrinkled, soiled, and sprinkled with slivers, as though from sleeping too close to Mother Earth and undressed planking, and the interest aroused by their coming was enough to drive thought of the missing book from all minds, including Sinful's. None had any bedding or extra clothing, but each possessed a large and a lively sense of injury; for, as Sinful joined them with his dark confrère, they stared at him sullenly, hungrily and enviously, as though his sleek, well-fed little body was both an affront and a temptation.

"Muster up around me here," said the Captain sternly, as he stepped upon the mizzen hatch. "I want a few words with you." They flocked around him and he continued: "Before you join your shipmates forrard I want you to know that this ship will be run strictly in accordance to the new Seaman's Law. The ship is seaworthy; the forecastle has been repaired and is warm and dry; the complement of men is full; I have laid in full store of the provisions named in the scale, and a complete outfit of slop-clothing, on which you can draw unless under punishment; I have forbidden my officers to strike any of you, but if one of you strikes an officer that man may be shot dead as a mutineer. The law is unchanged in that regard. You may also be lawfully shot if you resist going in irons as a punishment for insubordination. Your working and sleeping hours are not prescribed by the law, and are left to the descretion of your officers, depending on your conduct. You will find me fair, in spite of the trouble you have made me; but I shall allow no pistols or sheath-knives among you. Turn your pockets inside out — all of you."

Silently and sullenly they obeyed the command. Every pocket in every garment was pulled out in plain sight. All were empty.

"That will do. Mr. Peck, have you anything to say to them?"

"Yes, sir — thank you, Captain — I have. I want to say to this gang of ruffians, who maltreated me while before the mast, that I am heart and soul in accord with the spirit of the new law — particularly as regards the shooting of mutineers. I want to call Mr. Johnson's attention to the four leading spirits, so that he will know them. Mr. Johnson" — he turned to the listening second mate, who stepped eagerly to his side — "see that big, wall-eyed hoodlum, squinting at me? That is Big Pig Monahan, who thinks he can fight." The negro smiled and nodded. "That hangdog tough behind him is Seldom Helward — a good citizen only when in jail. Beside him is Tosser Galvin, who can toss in more whisky without paying for it than any man in Cleveland. And the sneaky-looking scoundrel over here, with the look of a pickpocket in one eye and a barkeep in the other, is Poop-Deck Cahill. Look out for these four, Mr. Johnson."

Poop-Deck's fine features reddened in anger, and he said to the Captain: "May we say a word or two, unofficially, sir, to Mr. Peck, before we begin?" The Captain nodded.

"Sinful," said Poop-Deck, "when you drugged us, your guests at a parting supper, and shanghaied us aboard this ship in which you were bound to sail by the terms of your bet with Helward, you perpetrated what was a practical joke to you, but a wrong involving thousands of dollars loss to us. For this we hammered you well in the forecastle; but when clear of the ship at Singapore we were willing to call it square. You, however, chose to carry it on. You so prejudiced Captain Jackson with lies as to our standing at home that he in turn prejudiced the Consul, and we found every door, and every ear, in Singapore closed to us. The banks would not deal with us, and, unable to get our drafts honored, we suffered privation until compelled to sign in this ship of which fortune has made you first mate, with power of life and death under the law. We have resolved to do our work and obey the law, but if you abuse your power over us, remember that you have thirteen implacable enemies who will make no appeal to law, but will, when the time comes, punish you with physical pain that will make you wish for death."

"And I'll say," said Seldom Helward, hoarsely, when Poop-Deck had paused for breath, "that you needn't abuse your power to hear from me again. I've camped on your trail, my joker, and don't leave it till I hunt you out o' Cleveland, or into jail."

To the credit of Sinful's sensibilities be it said that he fidgeted visibly under Poop-Deck's denunciation and paled at Seldom's threat; but before he could reply the Captain spoke.

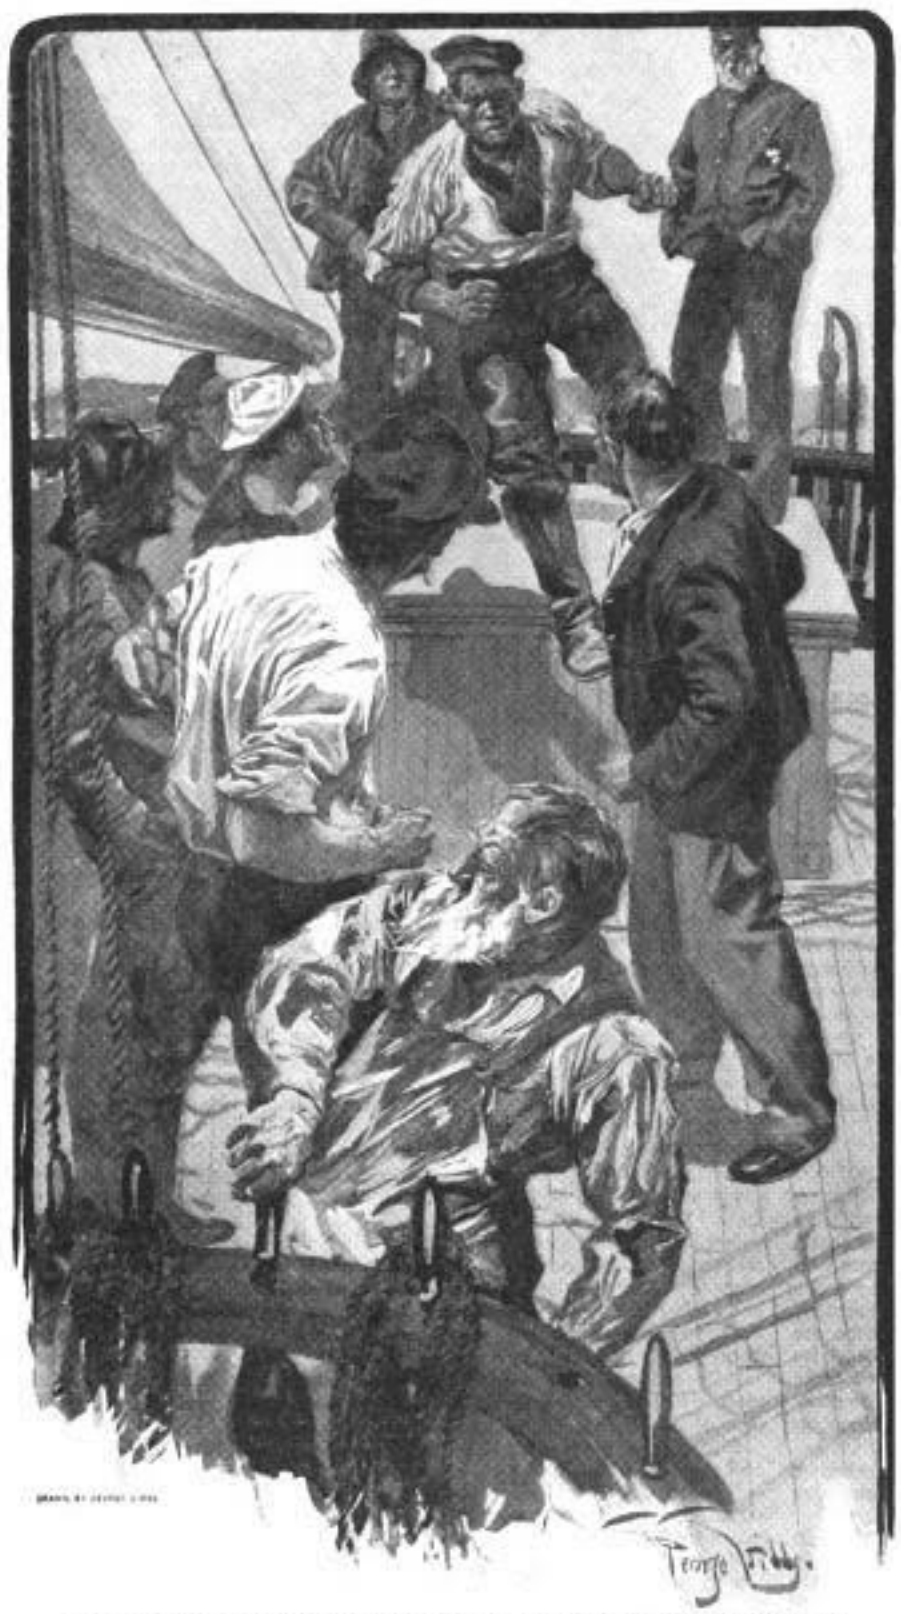
"This will do," he said firmly. "You are threatening. Go forward. Mr. Peck, man the windlass and pass the line to the tug."

"Wait a minute, Capt'n, if you please," said Big Pig Monahan, as the group separated. "Is this Senegambian going out second mate?"

"Mr. Johnson is second mate of this ship until Mr. Brown joins us at Manila. Mr. Peck is first mate until Mr. Becker comes."

"Very well, sir. Mr. Johnson has been looking at me like a dog at a bone for the last few minutes, and I think he's taken a fancy to me. Now, Seldom's all right, though a little outspoken, and I can answer for him and the rest of us that we'll do our work willingly, having signed willingly; but it's up to you, Captain, to keep your man Friday off our backs."

It may have been the epithets, or it may have been an encouraging nudge from Sinful's elbow that roused Mr. Johnson to action—or it may possibly have been his officerlike indignation at the Captain's complaisant manner toward these impudent men. He sprang into the air with an incoherent yell, arms and legs at all angles, and came down close to the startled Big Pig. But Big Pig was not too startled to parry the outshot fist of the negro and return with a crashing blow in the face which momentarily stopped him, but only increased his rage. Bellowing almost inarticulate profanity, the negro thrust his right hand into his pocket, drew it forth brass-shod, and again charged on Big Pig—as large a man as he, fully as skilled and courageous, but much older and slower in his movements. Then they fought furiously, Big Pig quiet and cool, the negro in a frenzy, while the men sprang to the rail and secured belaying-pins, and the Captain, with a drawn revolver, thundered at them to "Put them back." But he did not shoot, and they did not obey him; they circled about the giant antagonists, shouting words of encouragement to Big Pig and threatening curses to the negro, but before there was a chance to strike a blow, youth and brass knuckles prevailed over age and stiffness, and Big Pig went down senseless under a crashing blow on the forehead.



Sinful Peck, pale and anxious of face, had sprung up the poop-steps with his pistol ready, and the Captain now followed; for with Big Pig disposed of the infuriated negro turned to the others. None there could face him as long as had Big Pig, and few could remain within reach of those long, powerful arms for the second of time necessary to strike a blow. The negro sprang, dodged, whirled, struck—and when he struck a man went down—and as at last it became apparent to his excited faculties that he was actually winning against them all, his mouthings became intelligible.

"Forrard wi' you," he growled as he pursued them around the deck. "You heah what de Cappen say, you lazy, good-f'nothin' sogers. Go forrard, I tole you, and pass de towline. Wha' you t'ink, hey? You gwine to hab you' own way heah. Not much, I tole you."

Slowly they gave way, and with a man occasionally falling under his blows he fought them forward, until, dropping their useless belaying-pins, they grabbed the towline at his behest, with the frightened non-combatants of the crew, and passed the end up to the bows. He had "turned them to."

Flushed and jubilant, the victor came aft, passing two men still and bleeding on the deck, and four dazed ones zig-zagging painfully out of his path, and halted beside the unconscious Big Pig, over whom now stood the Captain and Sinful.

"You haven't killed him, Mr. Johnson," said the latter, "but better leave off your gloves next time."

IT MAY HAVE BEEN AN ENCOURAGING NUDGE FROM SINFUL'S ELBOW

"Give me those things," demanded the Captain sternly. Mr. Johnson, with surprise and doubt in his face, took off the brass knuckles and handed them to him. The Captain tossed them overboard.

"You can do all I require of you here," he said, "without manslaughter."

"Why, sah, he hit me fust," answered the negro in an injured tone; "an' den dey all jump on me, sah."

"Yes, I know—he hit you first. I saw that. But remember what I told you. Keep clear o' the law."

Sinful had slipped away to the other unconscious ones, and now reported: "All alike, sir. Broken skin, but nothing serious. They'll come to soon."

"Take them forrard, pass the towline, and man the windlass."

In passing the towline to the tug, and getting the anchor to the bows, Sinful, whose place was on the forecastle deck among the men, stood well up into the knight-heads with his hand continually in his pocket. The men must have known that that hand was closed on a pistol butt. They worked well in spite of their hurts, sullenly but respectfully, and only Seldom saw fit to forget his place. When he had climbed over the bow, and stood on the anchor-stock to pass the ring-stopper, he turned his battered visage upward to the diminutive first mate, and said slowly through still bleeding lips: "This counts heavily against you, you little viper. I saw you start the nigger a-going."

But Sinful ignored the speech entirely.

Mr. Johnson struck them no more that day, satisfying himself with jocular comments on their inferiority and with exasperating praise of himself, which the men listened to without answer. But in the long passage over to Manila, which, from the rather early breaking up of the southwest monsoon, the consequent gale, and succeeding baffling northeast monsoon, consumed nearly a month, he found many occasions in which forcibly to assert his dominion. What the Captain thought of this useless maltreating of willing men found no expression in his speech or manner. Discipline must be maintained, in spite of unwise legislation. What Sinful thought may be judged of by his merciless working of the men in their watch below, and frequent assurance of support and encouragement in answer to the negro's sometimes doubtful queries in regard to the power of the law; for he candidly conceded that he feared jail. But the moral influence of Sinful sufficed to keep alive his drooping courage, and when the anchor dropped in Manila Bay, every man forward—even the unoffending bosuns and the dozen landsmen—bore on face or body unhealed scars and blue contusions. And with the ship moored, the canvas furled, and a uniformed Health Officer come and gone; Big Pig Monahan came aft, with others at his heels, and respectfully asked the Captain for liberty.

"No," said the Captain, "you will get no liberty in this port."

"I demand it, sir, to make complaint against your second mate. I have a right to see the authorities."

"You have the right to demand to see the Consul in a foreign port, but this is now an American Colonial port, and I believe under martial law."

"The Revised Statutes give seamen the right to liberty and one-half their money at any port touched, Capt'n Jackson."

"On the ship's Articles there is a clause reading: 'No money or shore leave at Manila except at master's option.' You have signed away your right. Go to your work."

The Captain turned away, and Big Pig, almost black in the face, went forward. The Captain soon left the ship in a shore boat, and late in the day, just after the passing of a quartermaster's tug, towing a lighter out to the naval fleet at Cavite, Big Pig was missed. Neither returned to the ship that night, but in the morning the shore boat approached with the Captain; and with him in the stern-sheets were two other men whom Sinful examined carefully with the glasses.

"A good chance for complications here, Mr. Johnson," he said as he laid down the glasses. "Here are our predecessors."

"Our what, sah?"

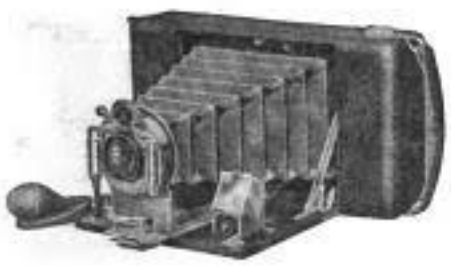
"The two mates we left in the hospital at Manila—Mr. Becker and Mr. Brown. You get your discharge here, I believe, but the question is, who's mate of this ship."

"You is, sah, but I goes ashore. Is you sure, Misser Peck, what you say, dat I can't be 'rested fo' t'umpin' de men? Wha' you t'ink dat Big Pig's gone to?"

"Don't know, and don't care. I've troubles of my own."

"But you tole me, sah, dat you'd stan' by me, an' not let me be 'rested. Didn't you? You tole me dat." Sinful had turned away, and the negro was following him, but the little man only answered irritably: "Fight your own battles, and let me alone."

He went down the poop-steps to receive the party at the gangway, and the second mate followed slowly, the aggrieved look which had come to his face giving way to one of malevolent resentment.



The three climbed aboard, the visitors carrying their dunnage, as though they had come to stay, and the Captain said gayly: "Here we are again—all of us together. They're a little limpy yet, Mr. Peck, but still in the ring. How is everything?"

The two had stared disdainfully at Sinful, and he returned the stare with interest before answering the Captain. Then he said: "Big Pig Monahan has disappeared, sir. Don't know how."

"Why didn't you watch him? Now my hands are tied. Come up on the poop, all of you." They followed him up

WHITE BRONZE

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information, stating about what expense you anticipate. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere.

the steps. "It's this way," he continued, when they had reached the open space abaft the cabin. "He openly demanded permission to complain to the authorities, and I heard his demand before witnesses. So, I am liable for the safe delivery of Mr. Johnson if he is wanted. I can't let you leave the ship, Mr. Johnson, until I am sure you are not wanted."

"Is I gwine to be 'rested, sah?" asked the negro anxiously.

"I don't know. If they want you I shall give you up, for I warned you to keep within the law, and I cannot stand civil damages on account of your escape."

"But Misser Peck," said the negro, turning to the sober-faced Sinful—"Misser Peck he tole me it was all right; didn't you, sah?"

"I told you that it would be difficult to convict. It is an after-consideration," said Sinful angrily. "Don't appeal to me; I can't prevent your arrest."

"Isn't this Monahan coming now, Mr. Becker?" said one of the newcomers softly to the other, pointing astern. Mr. Becker looked.

"That's him, sure enough. Look there, Capt'n Jackson."

They all looked. Big Pig was coming in state, seated under an awning in the after cockpit of a large, white steam launch, in the forward end of which were men dressed in the white working ducks of the American navy and the yellow khaki of the army. There were six of these last, and they carried rifles with murderous sword bayonets, and cartridge-belts supporting heavy revolvers. Beside Big Pig, chatting affably with him, was a portly, gray-mustached man dressed in immaculate white and gold—a naval officer. The launch steamed to the gangway, and the officer, Big Pig and the six soldiers climbed aboard. The party on the poop descended to receive them, and Mr. Johnson hurried into his room.

"Are you Captain Jackson?" asked the officer, after his eyes had wandered over the group and settled on the big skipper.

"I am, sir."

"Is this one of your crew?" he nodded toward Big Pig, who looked damp and disheveled, but happy, and the Captain affirmed that he was.

"He swam aboard the flagship from a passing lighter last night, and told a story of brutal treatment of seamen which aroused the Admiral's attention and interest. I am Captain of the Port, and he has ordered me to devote my personal service to this case. Have you a negro second mate named Johnson on board?"

"I will produce him," said the Captain, stepping to the companion. "Mr. Johnson," he called. "Come out. You are wanted."

Mr. Johnson came out with alacrity. His smile had become a ferocious grin, his scowl was deeper than usual, and his eyes held the desperate, murderous light of a fear-haunted animal. In his right hand was a long knife, and as he passed the Captain he buried this in his shoulder; then, as the Captain sank down groaning, he made for Sinful Peck. Sinful fled along the deck, and the men forward, who had dropped their tasks to watch the proceedings, scattered out of their way.

"Shoot him," roared the officer. "He has done murder. Aim—fire."

The six soldiers sank to one knee; six rifle-barrels were elevated and six bullets followed the frenzied negro, now roaring incoherent threats at Sinful for "gwine back on him."

He floundered heavily to the deck at Sinful's heels, and the outstretched knife slit a long gash in his right trouser leg. The bullets were just in time, but Sinful did not pause in his flight until he had circled the forward house; then spying the huge black form of his pursuer quiet on the deck he slowed down and approached with what dignity he could assume the group surrounding the wounded Captain.

"We must get him ashore at once," said the officer, "or he will bleed to death. Who is next in command here?"

"I am, sir," answered both Mr. Becker and Sinful.

"Two first mates? That's funny; but lift the Captain over quickly."

All the men had come aft now, and some, as the groaning and almost unconscious Captain was picked up, volunteered the information that the negro was dead.

"He deserved it," said the officer, "and under martial law it is the quickest solution of the trouble. Are you satisfied, Monahan?"

"Yes, sir," answered Big Pig soberly. "But there's another matter which you may be able to settle for us, sir. The question you just asked: Who is first mate of this ship?"

"Well, who is?" The officer looked at the two claimants, and then at the wounded Captain descending the side in the arms of the men.

"I am the signed first mate, sir," said Mr. Becker. "I came out to Singapore in this ship, and went to the hospital, with the understanding that I was to join the ship by steamer at Manila. I have done so."

"And you?" inquired the officer, turning to Sinful.

"I was promoted to be first mate in this man's place at Singapore," said Sinful, "and have been first mate since."

"I am still on the Articles as first mate," said Mr. Becker, "and I know that this man shipped as sailor out o' New York."

"Well, I don't know," said the puzzled officer. "As Captain of the Port I must leave some one in charge pending the Captain's recovery; but—I cannot replace you," he said to Mr. Becker, "without deposing this man. Can't you get along until the Captain can decide?"

"I am the lawful first mate, sir," said Mr. Becker doggedly, "and as such I will exercise my power if I stay here."

"But I am the last first mate," said Sinful doggedly. "I am in charge."

"Excuse me, sir," said Big Pig respectfully, "but the new Seaman's Law provides that all first mates of sailing crafts of over seven hundred tons register shall show certificates, as in English craft. Here is the law, sir—the latest Revised Statutes." He received a book handed him by Poop-Deck Cahill, who had drawn close to him, and opened it, pointing to a certain part of a page.

"My book!" exclaimed Sinful. "How did you get it?"

"Found it, my son," said Big Pig benignly, "in the forecastle."

"I know," said the officer, after a glance at the page. "I read up that new law lately. Are you certificated, sir?" he asked of Mr. Becker.

Mr. Becker triumphantly drew forth a pocketbook and displayed an engraved sheet of paper.

"Renewed last March, sir," he said; "and it's an ocean steamboat license—first class—twenty years old."

"That covers the ground," said the officer, after examining it. "And you?" he asked of Sinful.

"I have been master of Lake steamers. I am a first-class pilot on the Lakes, and I have a drawer full of those licenses at home."

"But they are of no use to you out here," said the officer, stiffening up. "I cannot wait longer, as the Captain is in danger. Your name, sir?" he asked of the rightful incumbent.

"John Becker, sir."

"I appoint you acting master of this ship until Captain Jackson recovers. Attention," he called to his soldiers. "Over the side—march."

He halted at the gangway to glance at the corpse of the negro. "Better box him up at once," he said, "and I'll send a lighter to take him ashore." Then he was gone.

"Steward," called Mr. Becker to this functionary, who stood in the cabin door. "Clean up my room, and if this man has any traps in it fire 'em out on deck. Go forrard out o' this," he said sternly to the white-faced Sinful.

"We'll take him, sir," said Big Pig with a joyous smile. "Come, Sinful, my boy." He hooked his big arm within Sinful's little one, Poop-Deck Cahill took the other one, and with Seldom Helward bringing up the rear and the whole crew flocking ahead the procession moved forward.

SURROUND your BUSINESS with SYSTEM

No matter how large it is nor how small, for

"The only things that succeed are those that are systematized."

That's what President H. H. Vreeland of the Metropolitan Street Car System says in the April number of System. And it's true—absolutely.

It's the reason why YOU should read System—the 96-page magazine. Don't waste time trying to think out systems for yourself. Don't experiment with your business. The methods that have failed with others will fail with you. Beware of them. The systems that others have found successful will help you to success. Make use of them. Learn of them in System. There is no other way.

System helps a great western manufacturing concern, The R. K. LeBlond Machine Tool Co.: "The magazine has afforded us very valuable information and hints; we have established several systems on lines brought out by your valuable publication. —F. E. LEBLOND, General Manager."

The man of smaller business operations also learns, for F. A. Philbrick of Baraboo, Wis., says: "I have learned more from System in five months than in ten years of hard study and knocks in business. It is worth ten times the charges for it."

And what a monthly reading of System has done for them it will just so surely do for you.

The man of experience gets in System the experience of other men. To the young man beginning business, to the clerk, bookkeeper or student, System is more than a business college.

To enumerate System's contributors is simply to name the foremost system experts and the strongest business men.

The general articles they write will help any man—business or professional. The special articles for one's own work no man can afford to miss.

Systems actually used in large successful factories, offices, stores, banks, publications, professions, are described in detail. And experts show how these same systems can be adapted to your business or profession—no matter what it is—how large or how small.

ARTISTIC HOMES

NEW 1024-PAGE BOOK, JUST OUT

Purchasers of 1024-page book will require no other, as it is the largest published. Indispensable to any one intending to build.

PRICE $1

In Board Cover $2 in Leatherette

If interested in the erection of a building, for either private or public use, you can secure as good or better services of this office than elsewhere, and at no more cost for plans

When you build, make it attractive. Obviate that everlasting sameness in style. Consult an architect of ability, large practice, modern methods and ideas. It is money well-spent

Home-builders by all means secure an architect. Discriminate against cheap publishing company plans. Employ competent aid. You cannot build rightly from mere picture plans

Having a special department for the planning of low-cost houses it is reasonable to presume that you can secure better and quicker services of this office than can be had elsewhere

It costs no more to embody style, convenience and economy in plan arrangement than when it is commonplace. Make a wise selection of your architect and depend on results

My ideas are not cheap ideas and therefore I cannot usually enter into work competitively, as many do, at a possible loss, but will guarantee entire satisfaction in plan arrangement

A special feature of my buildings is: they are not disappointing when built, but pleasing in general appearance. This is due to starting right with the important preliminary plans

Many have little or no conception of the value of a competent architect's services and are content with merely the scale plans, without the vitally-important detail drawings

My success in planning stylish houses is in readily seeing my clients' desires, producing for them a better home than was expected for a given sum. Preparedness is really the secret of any success

If you intend to build this summer place your order now. It is none too early. Take time to formulate your ideas in a practical way, with the aid of an architect of broad experience

You should get the above book now, if you have the least idea of building at any future time. Nothing of the kind yet published. Has 1000 plans and 1000 designs of moderate-cost houses

LITERARY FOLK

Their Ways and Their Work

The Sudden Increase of Memoirs and Biographies

DURING the last ten years a curious new development has, almost unnoticed, taken place in our literature. It is the sudden increase of memoirs and autobiographies. A most lucky happening for coming generations of Americans! For these personal portraits, after all, are the only medium by which the real history of a people is preserved with veracity or force. To the student who seeks to know the inner story of a nation, what are the dull roll-calls of battles or of political tricks and counter-tricks in dignified histories compared to these vivid flash-light portraits of living men that show them to us with every detail of their daily lives, their clothes, their food, their amusements, their most petty idiosyncrasies of thought or of action?

For two reasons, however, our memoirs are inferior to those written by English or French men. One is, that they are written for the most part because the authors fancy they have seen something worth the telling—the Civil War, a great political crisis. These are not the stuff of which an autobiography valuable to the historian should be made. The more personal, the more minute its pictures of private life the better worth preserving is it for future students.

Again, the American is at heart a shy fellow. He is quite willing that his doings should be exploited in the papers—his big deals, his wife's balls. But he keeps his coat tightly buttoned over himself. The staring world has no business with him, his vices, his longings, or his failures. He tells it nothing about them. Hence American autobiographies are an assortment of facts hung on a lay figure like the garments in a tailor's window draped on a wire manikin.

An odd proof of this is found in the countless private histories of our families which fill the shelves of historical libraries. There is hardly an American family from the A's to the Z's which has not been immortalized in one of these records by some of its members. Turn over the pages of these histories and you will find interminable lists of descendants of the original emigrants with the dates of their births, marriages and deaths, and a careful record of every office or other honor conferred on them. But we know of but one in the many thousands of these books which gives a hint as to the character of the inherited traits which made these twigs of the genealogic tree human. What does it matter to any living being that "in 1795, John, son of Joseph 3rd, m. Mary, dau. of Rachel 4th"? But if we were shown the dominant family trait, the miserliness, the energy, the pious zeal, the murderous instinct creeping down in the blood of these people, uplifting or ruining them, how dull would all your novels be to us! But the American is too shy to lay bare his family secret, even to his family.

The one recent autobiography which is wholly bare of any such reserve is that of Augustus Hare, who died a few weeks ago in England. It is as destitute of decent reticence as that of Benvenuto Cellini, and will some day, for that reason, be as valuable to the student of history as is that incomparable photograph of a life.

Mr. Hare "was principally rich," he tells us, "in cousins." He was allied to the Stanleys, the Maurices and the more famous Hares, and to innumerable people of title from duchesses to lord mayors just knighted. His kinsfolk supplied him with material. He had keen eyes and a merciless tongue. From his boyhood he had an insatiate hunger for gossip and had a habit of setting down in his diary every choice bit which came to him. His business was to write notebooks dealing with the private history of continental towns and English shires. Most of them, as we all know, are delightful gossipy companions on a journey. His researches gave him access to most of the great houses of England, and while he was a guest in them he ran down any scandal or legend belonging to them. These, with dozens of ghost stories, form the bulk of the four large volumes of his Memorial of My Life. There is hardly a contemporary man or woman of any note in England of whom he does not leave a thumb-nail sketch, usually etched in by malice. They will be useful hereafter to the student of present English history. Even the fact that this envious, carping little man was everywhere entreated with such patience gives us a new view of the large good humor, the self-satisfied content of the Englishman. As to his accuracy one example will suffice. He tells us that he had met at dinner Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, an American, famous for a poem, The Battle-Hymn of the Republic, which she wrote and which was sung by the whole Federal Army after its defeat at the battle of Pittsburg.

A biography which also has the value of absolute lack of reticence is that of Mrs. Fanny Kemble. There was apparently in her opinion nothing which concerned her own personality too petty to be of interest to the public. If her picture of the social life of her time had been drawn with as vigorous a pencil as were her own feelings and doings, the book would have had value as a glimpse into our domestic history during the last century.

Joseph Jefferson's Autobiography, on the contrary, is a charming picture of the notable men of his time whom he has known, but Rip himself is not among them. For once the great actor is content to keep out of sight, to be the stage manager, and suffer other players to amuse the public while he remains behind the curtain.

A book by John S. Wise called The End of an Era will be of great value to the future historian of the Civil War.

In the fifties the old joke was current in the South: "In Virginia you find men and women, and Wises." Henry Wise and his sons represented a class of Americans now absolutely extinct—hospitable, kindly, sincere men, with a purblind, bigoted faith in their State and the old order of things. Improvement there was impossible; the man who hinted at it was a traitor, his neck cried out for the rope. All social difficulties were referred to a pair of pistols and an open field.

Governor Wise, however, was early awake to the signs of the times. Long before the John Brown raid he set all the young men of the Old Dominion to forming companies and drilling, and stumped the State from tidewater to the Ohio in person, making vehement appeals to the lethargic planters and directing confidential prayers to "the God of Virginia." The rest of the world, apparently, was left to the care of any deity it could find.

By MYRTLE REED

Author of "Love Letters of a Musician," "The Spinster Book."

Dainty and full of delicate fancy, this latest work of a favorite writer charms by its manner, pleases by its cleverness, and interests by its tale of true love, which sentiment is treated as the most exalting of emotions, but without the slightest touch of materialism.

A Book to be Enjoyed

"With exquisite skill quite her own, the author individualizes in this gracefully told story, the heart's devotion as the most exalted and exalting emotion. Miss Reed has the rare genius of attuning love to thrilling heights without a touch of coarse materialism. Withal she builds on a poetical plane, since her characterization is human."—Chicago Journal.

His son's book of Recollections of the War is full of vitality, prejudices and mistakes. But compared to most American biographies it is like a live man with red blood in him among stuffed straw figures. We contradict him angrily and quarrel with him as we read all the way through. But when we close the book we wish we had lived before the war, neighbor to the fighting governor and his sons, down there in old Accomac. Such men and such times are not found nowadays, even in Virginia!

You will find an amusing and striking contrast to this book in the most important biography issued in this country during last year—the Memories of a Hundred Years, by Edward Everett Hale.

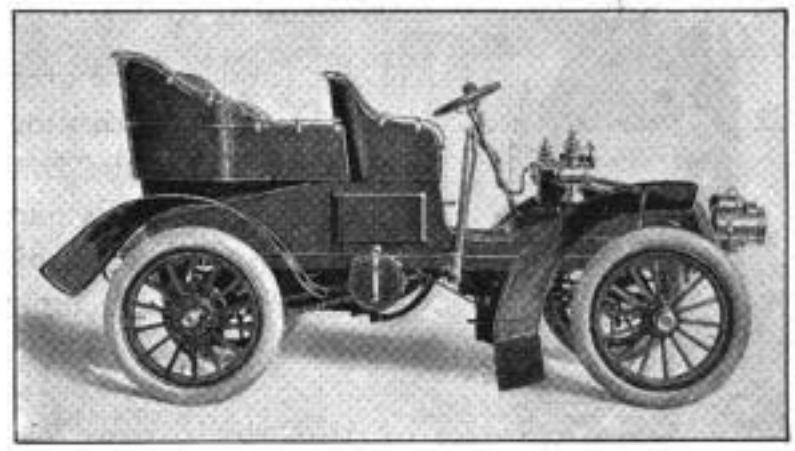
Mr. Hale is as direct a product of New England as the Wises were of Virginia. The book has been heralded for a long time as an inestimable contribution to American history. Mr. Hale himself calls it "a keyhole view of the century." But after all, it is chiefly notable as an exhibit of sectional character. Here we have the New Englander per se, by descent, by idiosyncrasy and above all, by blind, petty, ineradicable prejudice.

The keyhole through which he views the century is in a Boston door, and the range of vision through it is bounded by Milk Street and the Common. In his summary of our earlier history he attacks "the Virginian dynasty—its fuss and feathers and folderol"—with a fury which would be laughable in a younger man. He apparently cannot forgive Jefferson in that he and not some Harvard professor wrote the Declaration of Independence and moulded the character of the new-born nation.

In his summary of American literature, with the exception of a half-page given to Washington Irving, and one line to Joel Barlow, there is not a single author mentioned outside of the Boston clique.

This trait of the book will disappoint Mr. Hale's friends. He has many. No man among us who holds a pen is more kindly and genial at heart or is more widely beloved. But shrewd and keen-sighted as he is on every other point he seems entirely ignorant that he is a victim to this mental myopia. He complains that he has been accused of a certain arrogance and pleads guilty to it, but is apparently unconscious that it is his faith in Boston, not in himself, that gives him his aggressive bearing.

Had he no younger friends to tell him that the time for these petty sectional prejudices is gone by? The country has outgrown them. The man who sits by the wayside to sing of the sacred soil of Massachusetts or Virginia, or to pray to their separate gods, soon will be left to pipe alone.



When the future American Macaulay shall begin his work of telling the story of the first two centuries of our national life he will find his best material in the individual books which depict but a single phase of it. There are many records of the separate immigrations of races which have accuracy and value. New England has kept a strict account of her first settlers, so has Virginia. Rupp's history of the German immigrants is correct and exhaustive. Mr. Charles A. Hanna has given a general sketch of the Scotch-Irish settlers in the great valleys of Pennsylvania and Virginia.

But only in personal biographies will the historian come face to face with these dead and gone tribes whose blood mingled to make up the modern American. Every State has its store of such private records, memoirs and lives of noted judges, ministers and lawyers. You will find a stray copy on the farmer's bookshelves issued probably from some local press soon after the death of the great man. They are roughly bound and poorly printed; the grammar may be faulty, the diction absurdly ornate. But the flavor of them! They smell of the earth in which they grew as does a root of bracken torn up in the woods.

There are, for example, one or two copies existing of the Life of Meshach Browning, a hunter in the Cheat Range when George Washington was a young man fighting at Fort Duquesne. There is no other record of the life of those days in that region than this story dictated by the old man to some one who could write, nor of the beginnings of many powerful families whose ancestors hunted bear and panthers with old Meshach.

There are scores of such books, forgotten, out of print, and of no value except that they are true and human. Some blood of our ancestors has gone into the lettering of them.

We already have good histories of our national progress—our laws, our politics and our wars. But when the story of the Making of the American Race is written such records as these will furnish the material.

Soul Sonnets of A Stenographer

BY S. E. KISER

XXIII

This morning as he sat there in his chair,
  Half tilted back and got the mail and read,
  I put a letter on his desk and said,
While standing at his side: "Why, I declare!"
And from his shoulder took a long, dark hair.
  He gurgled fondly as he turned his head,
  Reached for the hair, but caught my hand instead,
And for a happy moment held me there.

Ah, dear old soul, how red his gray cheeks went—
  He hadn't shaved, and so the stubble showed—
  His eyes, as I looked in them, fairly glowed;
Alas, he lost his balance as he bent,
And, reaching out, upset the ink and rent
  His watch-chain. Oh! I felt that I'd explode.

XXIV

I wonder what compels my heart to sink
  When I foresee myself as his—his own—
  Up there with him in that big pile of stone?
It seems as if I trembled on the brink
Of some deep, dark abyss. I often think
  Of Teddy's handsome face when I have thrown Myself upon the bed to lie alone
And toss and fret and never sleep a wink.

Ah, there are wattles under William's chin
  Like those old roosters always have; his eyes
Are rather watery, too; but, fudge! I'll grin
And stand what must be stood. Who hopes to win
  The prize of wealth—the dazzling, splendid prize—
  Must also take the husk in which it lies.

XXV

I'll not be selfish when my wish comes true;
  They say that she is closer than the paste
  Upon a four-cent postage stamp. I'll taste
The joy that comes from giving; I'll go through
Dear William's pockets every night or two
  And cheer the poor; the gaunt wolf shall be chased
  From many a widow's door when I am placed
Where I may do the things I long to do.

My father shall give up his job and rest—
  Poor man, he's had to toil so long and hard.
And I shall keep my dear old mother dressed
  In stuff that costs two dollars cash a yard.
And on my carriage door I'll have a crest
  When I go riding down the boulevard.

XXVI

What silly things men are! A girl may wind
  Them round her fingers if she only tries;
  They say big words, pretending to be wise,
But, oh, they're stupid and they're very blind.
I'll take good care that William dear shall find
  Some man to fill my place here when she dies;
  I'll blackball every woman who applies,
However old she is, when I've resigned.

If only Teddy were the master here,
  I'd coyly give him courage to be bold;
He's silly like them all, but when he's near
  I'm filled with all the joy that I can hold;
How gladly I would lead him by the ear
  If he had but a tenth of William's gold.

XXVII

There's something wrong. There's trouble in the air.
  Her sister came here yesterday. He sent Me from the private office; as I went
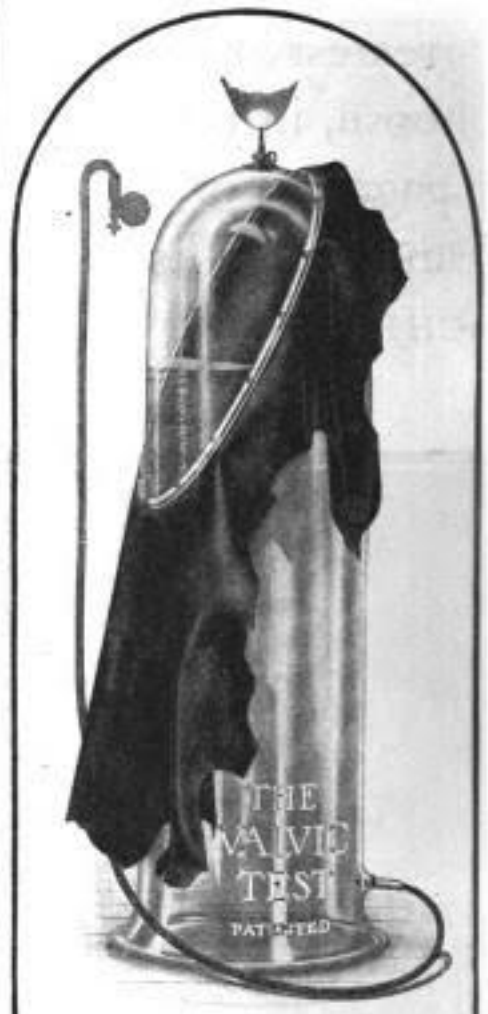
She gave me an unfriendly, nasty stare—
I wonder if the old frump thinks I care?
  Some day, perhaps, I'll ask her what she meant;
  When humbly she comes wanting to repent
I'll give her glances that will crimp her hair.

His face was clouded when she'd gone away,
  He sat and rubbed his chin and thought and thought,
  And when I stole up to his side and sought
To make him glad I noticed with dismay
  A bunch of violets that I had brought
All scattered where the scraps of paper lay.

XXVIII

The end has come! Oh! what a fool was I
  To think of giving up my soul for gold.
  Some busybody went to her and told
The wretched thing a monstrous, wicked lie—
Therefore she has decided not to die.
  The mad old wildcat says I'm bad and bold,
  And so I'm rudely turned out in the cold—
What shall I say when people ask me why?

Ah, well! I'm glad it's done. Now I am free
  To give my love to Ted and claim the joy
  Ambition almost led me to destroy
The poor old fools, they've merely shown to me
The happy course I blindly failed to see—
  Oh, Teddy, thank your stars, you lucky boy.



XXIX

Now, if the tears were poison that I shed
  I'd weep a bucketful and find some way
  To make them drink. The joy that yesterday
I might have claimed as all my own has fled.
I wish that they and all of us were dead!
  Fate brings us here, not asking if she may—
  She grants us no protesting word to say—
It's just announced that Nell has married Ted!

Whether at Naishapur or Baltimore
  We leave loose screws, they wreck the plans we've made;
They sadly err who fancy that the score
  Is ever sure before the hand is played;
Unhappiness for her is still in store
  Who counts her goslings ere the eggs are laid.

Good Cheer and Good Food Go Together

Improper feeding is the source of most human ails. Sick people don't laugh much. It is the healthy and strong who see the sunny side of everything. Pure, scientific food will correct most ailments and bring laughter and good cheer in place of sickness and gloom.

The wife of a physician of Dayton, O., says:—"Before I had finished the first package of Grape-Nuts, which I got at the urgent request of a friend of mine several months ago, I was astonished to find I was less nervous over small matters and worried less over large ones, laughed more readily and was at all times more calm and contented than I had ever been in my life. I found also that the hollow places in my neck and shoulders were filling out and that astonished me as I had always been very thin, as women with starved nerves are apt to be.

"After a time I discontinued the use of Grape-Nuts for two months and found the old symptoms return at once. I went back to the use of the food again and feel well and strong. I can increase my weight at will from five to ten pounds a month by using more or less of the food. Before I was married I was for five years a trained nurse, and I have never in all my experience seen anything to act as quickly and favorably as this scientific food." Getting On

Bookkeeping Farmers

A GREAT many times in my life I have been asked the question, "Can farming, as a business, be made to pay?" The question is a very old one and I suppose will continue for some time to be asked. My answer has always been the same: "Yes, but it must be remembered that farming, as a business, is subject to the same general principles which govern any other business."

If a man were to start a cotton mill and keep no account of receipts and disbursements, take no care of his machinery and keep no lookout on the market, how long could he continue in business, or what bank or individual would think for a moment of advancing him credit to carry on his enterprise? And yet the same necessity for exact business methods exists in agriculture as in manufacturing.

"But," says some one (and, in fact, I heard this same argument only a few days ago), "a cotton mill is a big affair and a farm a comparatively small one; and the exact methods of the one are not necessary in the conduct of the other." Unquestionably the farm is usually—though by no means necessarily—a smaller affair, but a business conducted without system must of necessity be small.

I have purposely used the cotton mill as an illustration because, though great fortunes have been built up by it, the making of cotton cloth is not, in itself, a very profitable industry. There is a larger percentage of profit on many agricultural operations, and the comparison of the two industries illustrates the old truism that a bad business well managed will pay where a good business poorly managed will not.

It is true that the number of business failures among farmers is extremely small as compared with other classes, a fact that many agricultural journals dwell upon with insistence. But why are these failures so infrequent? Simply because, with a very large proportion of farmers, agriculture is not a business at all, but only a means of subsistence, which is a very different thing. A man who has no business cannot fail in it. But though farmers may not often be driven into bankruptcy, they sustain losses from neglect of business methods which they little suspect.

An illustration of this, which I think is worth giving, recently came to my notice.

An acquaintance of mine had one hundred and two cows on his dairy farm. The farm was not paying, and he asked me if I could find where the trouble lay and point out a remedy. After a careful examination of his farm and equipment I told him I doubted if all of his cows were paying him a profit.

He was surprised and said that though the cows varied in quality they were all good cows. The test, however, which consisted in milking each cow separately until her milking qualities were fully ascertained, disclosed the fact that eleven out of the one hundred and two were being kept at a loss, while several others were barely self-supporting!

The weeding out of these worthless animals made it possible to dispense with the services of one of the farm hands, and a further test proved that the cows would give just as much milk and keep in better health on a considerably less expensive ration—a thing their owner should have known long before.

In Your Home

this very day you need the Angle Lamp. You need it because it is more brilliant, more economical, and because it is easier to handle than the light you now use, no matter what it is. If that statement is not strong enough, we will take all the chances of proving it by shipping you a lamp and refunding your money if you don't find it exactly as represented. All you have to do is to let us convince you, as we have convinced thousands of others. If you could conceive of the beauty and grandeur of this light, its simplicity and the entire absence of the various faults that cause dissatisfaction in other systems, you would marvel at yourself for having been without so long. Now that the days are getting longer, it is just the time you need a light in your house that you would not know was there so far as care goes—a light that just goes on and does its work quietly and without making any fuss. If you let the matter lay over until Fall, you will be out just four months of comfort. Don't do it. The comparatively little heat given by the Angle Lamp makes it a positive luxury during the warm weather. It hangs high in the room, well up out of the way, is handled like gas, being lighted and extinguished in exactly the same way, and can be left turned low for any length of time without the slightest odor or danger of explosion. There isn't any other lamp on earth that this is true of.

IN EQUIPPING YOUR HOME

don't fail to learn about the Angle Lamp. It is the ideal home light, and is used by some of the most prominent millionaires and representative citizens, not only of this country, but of the whole world. We can send you the names of people who do not have to figure the cost of anything; they use the Angle Lamp because it is good. Thousands of people use it because it is good and economical, too. Send for our catalogue E P, and trade off your trouble for an Angle Lamp. It is something you need.

ROBERT LOW'S SON & HOWARD
167 Strand, W. C., London, England
509 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y., U. S. A.

The advantage to the farmer of knowing just "where he is at" in each and every department that he has in hand would seem to be so self-evident as to be beyond the realm of discussion. "But I don't need to keep books," said a country neighbor of mine; "I have a good livin' and I'm sure o' that much; then if I have, say, $500 to the good at the end o' the year, I don't need any book but my bank book to show me I've got it—and there's my profit, see?"

No, I didn't see, and I asked him at what figure he estimated the cost of his living. He had very vague ideas on this subject and was surprised when I told him that he ought to know, and that the figure should be added to his $500. I said I supposed he at least knew what he paid out during the year for groceries, flour and household supplies. But no, he didn't know even that. Further talk disclosed the fact that he never disbursed any cash for these luxuries, but "cal'lated" for his hens to pay the store bill, always trading eggs for groceries.

"Then you don't know how much to credit your hens with?" No, he didn't. But the critters done all he required of 'em; they paid the store bill.

My averment that an accurate knowledge of one's business was essential to obtaining the best results of which it was capable he admitted did sound kinder rash'nal; but he cal'lated to hit pretty nigh the mark without much cipherin', and concluded as follows: "We farmers hev got a vein o' luxuriousness in us that ain't always evident in our exteriors, and we're willin' to lose a few thousands o' dollars in a lifetime for the sake o' freedom from harassin' details—a sort o' livin' up to our ideals, as our parson says." The unquestioned philosophy of this reply excited my admiration, but I doubted its truth. I felt sure that he would not pay the price, nor anything like it, for that particular kind of freedom if he realized it in its full extent.

This man was by no means a fool; on the contrary he had much native sagacity and many sterling qualities, but his training from boyhood up had all been in the lines which he followed, and having attained a moderate success he placed the stamp of full approval upon himself and his manner of farming. He was doubtless honest in his judgment, but his success was not in a large enough way nor of a sufficiently attractive kind to justify it.

The Other Side of the Picture

The antipathy to bookkeeping existing among farmers is deep-rooted, and is probably born of the twofold nature of agriculture that I have already indicated—namely, that it may be, according to circumstances, either a means of subsistence or a business. Very many farmers are thus carrying on a hybrid sort of industry, which is neither the one thing nor the other; certainly much elevated above the means-of-subsistence kind of agriculture, but never approaching the dignity and symmetry of a well-developed and organized business. It is an industrial anomaly, with nothing exactly like it in the whole range of trades and callings. But omitting further criticism of what is perhaps the natural outcome of the conditions which first shaped the agriculture of a new continent, let us look at the other side of the picture and see what can be done where farming has been conducted on a strict business basis.

A gentleman in the West Indies with whom I am well acquainted, and at whose house I have spent many days, started in life with a small and much-worn-out coffee plantation, which was left him by his father. He now owns eight country properties, the smallest of which is a stock-farm on which he has 600 head of cattle and mules. He accumulated all this property by agriculture alone, never having been in any other business.

Not very far from him lives another, a coffee planter, who started a dozen years ago $20,000 in debt. His net profits now amount to over $30,000 a year.

These men, to be sure, are in the tropics where natural conditions are extremely favorable to agriculture. But they made money where others lost it; in fact, each and every property that they bought was in the market because its owner could not make it pay. Nature does a great deal for you in the tropics, but she will not run your business for you.

But we need not go outside of our own country to find agricultural successes equally great. Some twenty or twenty-five years ago a farmer went to a manufacturer of harvesting machines and asked for credit on the purchase of a single reaper. That farmer was not a genius, but he had an idea which, properly carried out, he believed would greatly increase his prosperity. It was simply to conduct his business, as nearly as its nature admitted, as any other industrial enterprise would be conducted; to reduce his labor to a regular system, having his men begin and leave off work at the sound of a whistle or bell; to care for his stock and machinery as a part of his investment, just as the cotton manufacturer cares for his engine and looms, and to keep a careful account of his business, so that by consulting his books he could always know just where he stood. The credit was granted. When I last heard of him he was using thirty self-binding reaping machines to harvest his wheat, and he was rich, even according to modern standards.

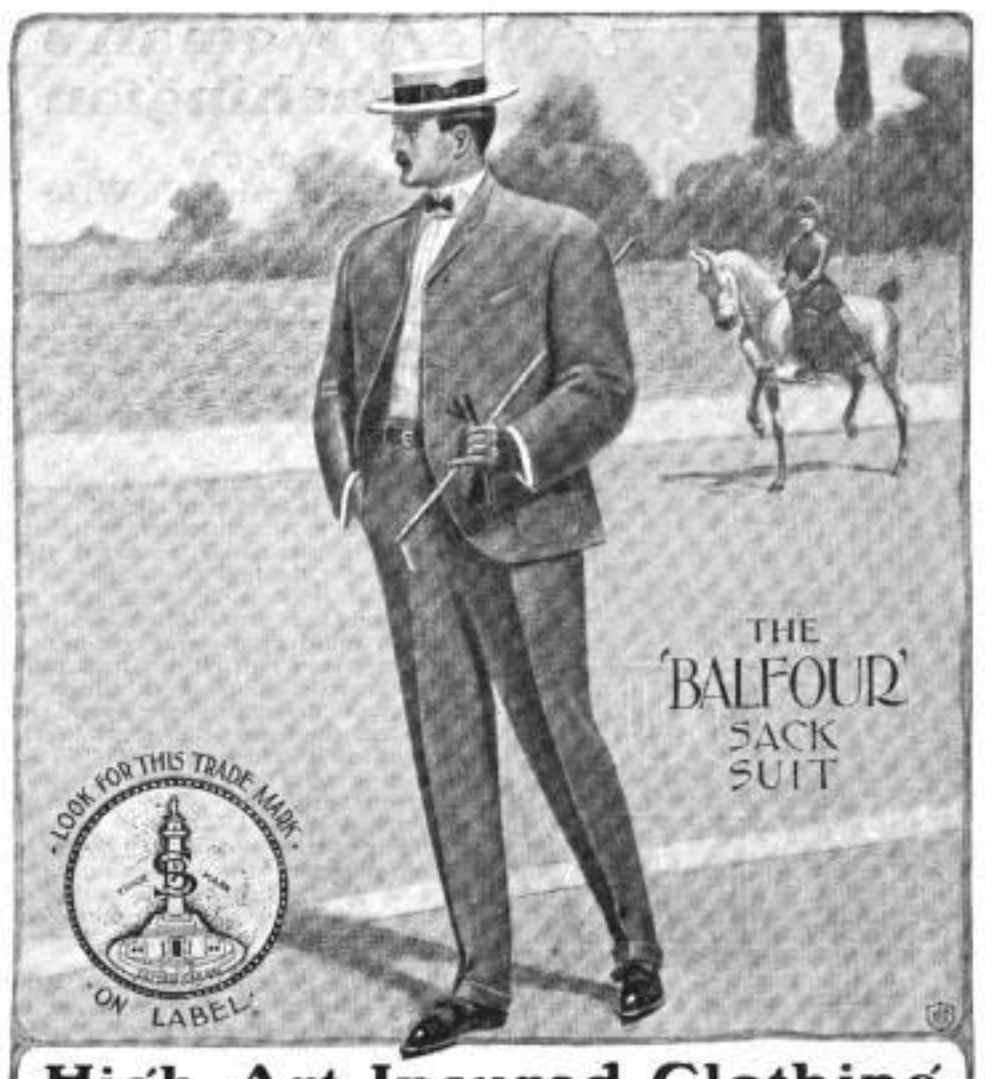
This great business was established in one of the Western States, where the soil is deep and rich. In direct contrast to it in this respect I may cite another instance here in the East. Quite recently (I do not recall the date, but I think within a dozen years) a few men formed a partnership and purchased six or eight Massachusetts farms, their idea, like that of the above-mentioned wheat-farmer, being to run them on strictly business principles. This was really a pretty daring experiment, as the land was rougher and poorer than it is ever advantageous to buy for farming purposes. There is enough good land in the world for all, and I have always held it a needless folly to choose, for farming, land that Nature never intended for it. Despite this drawback, however, it not only paid but paid handsomely. With better land it would, of course, have paid still better, but its owners are more than satisfied with the result, and as an object-lesson it is of more value as it is.

What System Will Do

But perhaps of greater value as an illustration than any other instance I could cite is that of a man in my native State of Rhode Island. He inherited from his father a very good farm, beautifully situated and of fertile soil, though rather far from market. For some reason or reasons it paid him very little and he became greatly dissatisfied. He finally decided to keep for one year a separate account of each feature of his farm in order to ascertain which was the most and which the least profitable. This brought to light some surprising facts. He found that he had been fattening steers at a loss, and that his dairy was barely self-sustaining. His sheep paid much better, but the one feature which paid far in excess of any other was his poultry. On this there was a net profit of a trifle over a dollar a head per annum.



He now gradually disposed of his cattle, keeping more sheep, and increasing his poultry (which he kept on the "colony plan") till he had over seven thousand hens. Figured on the above basis, which is a safe one, the income from these alone is no mean figure, to say nothing of what he realizes from his sheep and other sources. I have personally examined (and admired) his farm a great many times and know that it is an exceedingly profitable one. And yet this is the same farm which formerly yielded only a meagre and unsatisfactory income.

I might cite other examples, but the above are probably sufficient. They cover very diverse conditions of soil and climate, and, I think, contain in pretty full measure the answer to our question.

The question may very naturally follow, "If agriculture can be made to pay so well as a business why have not more men gone into it as such?" The answer is simple. Young farmers have rarely been trained in exact business methods, and habit holds them to their manner of life; while young men in the cities lack that intimate knowledge of agriculture without which all the method and system in the world would never make the farm pay. The number has thus been restricted of those who would naturally grasp the possibilities of agriculture, and to whom it would appeal as a thing in which brains and capital could be profitably invested.

Nevertheless, I believe that in the future—possibly much sooner than any of us expect—greatly increased attention will be bestowed upon agriculture as a business. Its possibilities, as brought to light by investigation and the gradual narrowing of many other fields, will naturally compel this. It is a field that has never been overdone and it contains golden prizes for those who will cultivate it aright; even in those departments which have been most largely developed and in which there has been the greatest competition there is still room for the production of the best. Of the best agricultural products there has never been, and never will be, an oversupply.

This IS YOUR BANK

The nearest mail box will receive your savings and the PEOPLES SAVINGS BANK will accept them, and pay you

4% Interest

Compounded Twice a Year

An account in this bank is the best and safest way for men and women of modest means to save their money. It involves no risk, and the profit is immediate and continuous.

For people of larger means, who have money lying idle, it affords an immediate investment just as safe as government bonds, and more profitable.

This bank pays 4 per cent. interest, annually, compounded twice a year. In other words, if you do not draw your interest, it is added to the sum you already have on deposit, and immediately begins to earn more money.

This is a great advantage to you.

In other forms of investment interest is not compounded. When it is due, if you have no use for it, it remains idle; but in this bank,

Every Dollar You Have on Deposit, whether it be Principal or Interest, earns 4 per cent.

It works for you 24 hours every day.

You Can Bank by Mail

This bank originated and developed the banking by mail system. It has depositors in every State in the Union, and in many foreign countries, who transact their business entirely by mail. Safety of principal is guaranteed by capital, surplus and profits of over $800,000.00, and by careful, conservative management.

The following table shows how rapidly savings grow with 4 per cent. compound interest added:

Weekly Savings	For 5 Years	For 10 Years	For 20 Years	For 40 Years
$0.25	$ 73	162	403	$ 1,204
.50	146	324	806	2,568
1.00	293	650	1,614	5,177
2.00	585	1,301	3,228	10,355
5.00	1,462	3,252	8,070	25,888

Deposits are received in any amount from $1 up and may be sent by registered mail, post-office order, express money order, or by draft or check on your local bank.

A Woman's Washington

By The Congressman's Wife

THIS is the time of year in Washington when, with the budding of the trees, the whole place seems given over to two classes of individuals: the individual who is just closing a career and the individual who is just beginning a career, though there is a third class, to be sure, that seems forever to have profited by that old advice given in Charles Sumner's famous telegram to Edwin Stanton, when the latter appealed from Andrew Johnson to him and he telegraphed, "Stick." This third class sticks from Administration to Administration, and always seems to be possessed of a career of which few remember the beginning or foresee the end. Never before in the several years that Robert and I have been in Washington have we been called upon to say good-by to so many prominent men retiring from public life. Farewell dinners and gatherings have held sway all during the spring season, until I have felt, with George Eliot, that "in every parting there is an image of death." I said as much on one of these farewell occasions to Governor Merriam, who is closing his career in Washington. He said gayly:

"There is no death image in my parting with Washington. I would rather quote, 'I have no parting sigh to give, so take my parting smile.' It's a clear case of opportunity, and opportunity, you know, has hair in front but is very bald behind."

"I suppose," put in Senator P——, "that you are going to do what Henderson, the retiring Speaker, says every outgoing man in the House is going to do? Henderson said that he had asked various outgoing men what they were going to do when they got out of Congress, and that every man of them had declared he should take six months' solid rest, 'which means,' said the Speaker slyly, 'that they are all going to practice law.'"

"Incidentally, perhaps," chipped in Senator Blank dryly—for Senator Blank, Robert and Senator P—— are in that class who are "sticking," and who are still in their mid-careers and are rather skeptical of others remaining long away from Washington—"those fellows will practice in their wards and primaries in order to get back here."

"Oh, well, after all," said Senator P——, "Washington is a good deal like the famous Shawnee spring down in Virginia. It is an Indian spring, and the Shawnee Indians fully believed that if any one once drank of its waters that man, whether Indian or white man, would come back before he died to drink of that spring once more. So it is with Washington—men, if they ever get away at all, come back to die here. There are some among my old friends, though," and the Senator began to smile reminiscently, "who in all the forty years I have known the town have never crossed the District line or changed their occupation. Have you ever met, Mrs. Slocum, my distinguished old friend who sells the Hagerstown Almanac in the market-house here?"

"I never even heard of the Hagerstown Almanac," said I.

"Well, the Hagerstown Almanac, in this part of the world, among the natives and the oldest inhabitants, ranks next to the Bible and the Maryland code," returned the Senator, and he continued, "This old fellow has sold it down in the centre market ever since I can remember. And then there is another humble friend there who is very proud of having been written up in the papers lately. She will tell you she was raised by 'ole Marse Tipton,' over in Charles County. She knows all the secrets of 'yarb' and root decoctions, and she can conjure the sick. She calls the big market-house the 'mash' market, and she has sold her wares in that vicinity ever since the days of the Rebellion. She will particularly recommend to you a little weed she calls 'Adam-and-Eve,' which she says, with a sharp look at you as she guesses your calling, will make glue strong enough to guarantee any statesman in the country sticking to his job up yonder at the Capitol. Then there is still another lowly friend who has never changed his place or calling since I first came to Congress. He sells those little, dried, smoked herring which are so tasty and which the true old Marylander always calls 'Potomac robins.'"

"Well," said Robert, "I am glad there are some others besides legislators who do not

Some years ago we produced what we call our "Footform" last; we were a long time getting it ready; it proved to be much more than simply a good name.

Our illustration shows a Selz Royal Blue shoe, black vici, single sole, made on this "Footform" last; a perfect shoe for a gentleman's summer wear. It will comfortably fit, in a proper size, a larger percentage of feet than any shoe made, at any price; foot-comfort from the first minute.

The most you want of shoes is to be satisfied with them. Isn't it? To have them fit; and look fit, to you and your friends; and to wear the money's-worth; that's all: satisfaction. If you want to know what shoe-satisfaction really means, ask your shoe-man for this Royal Blue shoe, and don't quit until you get it; you'll be surprised at yourself for not doing so before.

Royal Blue rubbers, too, for men, women and children; as good as the name, which means better-than-usual rubbers.

want to change their calling. Now, there is our friend Spooner; he does not want to change his a little bit. Our new Senatorial directory, issued for our recent extra session, sets forth that Spooner declined three important offices. The late President offered him the Interior portfolio, the Attorney-Generalship, and a membership on the Canadian Joint High Commission."

"And I know of a still more remarkable case of an old fellow," said the new Member who was lingering in Washington, "who thought he had had enough of the goods the gods provide, and was content to relinquish in toto Uncle Sam's bounty."

"It's the only case any one ever heard of, then," said the three skeptical members of the Senate.

"Commissioner Ware told me of it himself," continued the new Member. "The number of applications for pensions this Congress has been colossal, and I was over at the Pension Office to take care of one of my own pension cases. Mr. Ware had just had a letter that greatly delighted him. It was from a man out in Ohio saying that he had been getting thirty dollars a month pension, but that, as the Lord had prospered him in his old age, he thought he ought not to take it any longer. It was such a novel proceeding that Ware investigated it. Sure enough the name was on the rolls and the record was fine. Ware was so pleased that he dilated on this old hero and quoted one of his own war poems:

"'Lightning struck him, cannon shot him,
But he never failed nor flunked;
Danger left him, as it found him,
Undiscouraged, undefunct.'

"All the same," continued the new Member, "Ware thought he would better have a special agent out in Ohio look into the matter before he discontinued the pension. A few days ago he received a report which said:

"'Have found the pensioner. He is in an asylum hopelessly insane.'"

"Poor Ware!" laughed Senator P——. "Just when he thought he had found a spot in the desert where there were 'living springs of water and threescore and ten palms.'"

"That story," said Robert, "is akin to a story told at the Cosmos Club the other night when I was a guest there. The Cosmos Club has just been pronounced by a distinguished British scientist to be the only club in existence where one may get an authoritative answer to any scientific question broached. These men the other night were discussing phases of insanity, and a certain man made the statement that in every insane hospital in the country there could be found at least one case where an inmate was wrongfully committed to an asylum and held through conspiracy. Doctor Richardson, the expert alienist at the head of the Government Asylum of St. Elizabeth, was present, and promptly denied that such a case could exist. He said:

"'I know of a man some time ago who made that same charge and he was challenged to test it! He spent months searching for his case in various parts of the country, and finally he thought he had located it in one of the great institutions near here. This patient by his own showing when questioned said he had been declared insane for family reasons, and consigned to this asylum through conspiracy. He was, and had been all during his incarceration, entirely rational, and everything that could be learned of his case outside seemed to bear out his story. But the superintendent was loath to make out his discharge papers. The investigator became impatient and made a last, supreme effort, which failed. Then he paid a final visit to the patient. When it was time to go the patient said:

"'"Whether I get out or not, sir, I shall ever be grateful for your kind interest and help. Before you go I should like to know whether you happen to have a piece of toast in your pocket?"

"'"Toast!" ejaculated the investigator.

"'"Yes, sir, toast. I am a poached egg and I should like a piece of toast to sit on!"'"

This was such an absurd conceit that the laugh which followed was of the kind that some one has likened to a soul-stirring prayer. Then the conversation turned upon the general exodus from Washington and the President's contemplated swing around the circle. Senator Blank said:

"Some of the President's cronies are poking fun at him, and they are telling him that this trip of his, for pleasure, will be likened to one that Madison and Jefferson once made over a smaller area, which went down to history as 'a passionate courtship.'"

ANOTHER BIG BARGAIN

Sent Free for Examination

That every American home should have a good History of the United States admits of no discussion. THEREFORE THIS OFFER OF THE BEST MUST APPEAL TO ALL.

We've secured at just about the cost of paper, printing and binding 119 sets of that magnificent Library of United States History,

"Oh, but have you been in the President's new 'department of physical culture,' as he calls it?" asked Robert. "Well," he went on, "the President has turned the old Cabinet room, where Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation and where other great events in our history have had their inception, into what is popularly supposed to be a study, but what is in reality training-quarters. You'd never recognize the room now. There is scarcely anything to be seen but single-sticks, fencing swords, foils, plastrons, boxing-gloves, wire masks and the like; in fact, everything that goes to the equipment for the exciting bouts which the President delights in with General Wood. The President complained good-naturedly when he was showing us his new quarters that everybody seemed to get on to every bump and bruise that Wood had given him, but nothing was ever said about the whacks he's given Wood. The President was full of the championship fencing match which was to come off between Count Cassini and General Wood. Of course, the President thinks Wood the better swordsman, but I rather think, and so do others, that Cassini is the better man at the foils, for these foreign chaps are taught fencing with their alphabet. I hope Wood will win, for I'd like an American to win over the Diplomatic Corps."

"Well, for my part," said Mrs. Blank, solicitously, "I only hope that the President may get through without being minus an eye, a tooth or a finger. And above all, I hope the authorities who have this trip in charge will not yield to his wish to leave the secret service men, detectives and guards at home."

"Fancy the way that poor King Edward has to submit to being cared for," said I. "When he was ill last spring and Sir Francis Laking wrote a prescription, that prescription was placed in a wallet, locked and sealed, there being only two keys, one held by Sir Francis and the other by the royal apothecary. This wallet was then given to an equerry who carried it under escort of a royal guard to the royal apothecary. Now, fancy our President and his doctor submitting to such a rigmarole!"

"I don't know that that would be any worse," said the new Member dryly, "than what our President has to submit to from politicians in these much-fought-over postmasterships. Any two Congressmen can carry on a merry war over an insignificant crossroads postmastership and, willy-nilly, the President has to be in the fight."

"These postmasters in rural districts," laughed Senator P——, "ought to do as Abraham Lincoln did when he was made postmaster of New Salem in 1833. There was much dissatisfaction, and some threats were made against Lincoln. So his method was to carry the United States mail around in his hat and hand out the scanty letters to the scanty inhabitants whenever and wherever he chanced upon them. When finally the whole town of New Salem 'winked out,' Lincoln's ceremony of retiring from office was to put on his hat and turn over to the Government the magnificent sum of seventeen dollars, in silver and copper coins, which he had collected from the New Salem denizens, and which he had carried around in an old stocking."

"The truth is," said Senator Blank, "the President ought not to have to fritter away his time and patience on all these lesser matters and appointments——"

"Oh, but," interrupted Mrs. Blank, "this President does not regard anything in the United States as unimportant, or as a 'lesser matter.' He is ready to regard every cause and every demand as a claim upon him. Why, the other day"—and Mrs. Blank became confidential and gossipy—"I came upon a little thing which shows his kind heart. My dressmaker was threatened lately with a foreclosure of a mortgage. She had been unable to meet notes because of delinquent customers, and one customer, the wife of a man high up in one of the branches of our service, was her principal debtor. She had tried going to the department in order to have some part of his pay assigned her, but they told her it was a matter in which the department could not interfere, and she was in despair. Then, unexpectedly, Miss Alice Roosevelt came to the establishment to have a frock made. I said with a sudden impulse, 'Tell your story, as simply as you know how, to Miss Roosevelt. She may suggest some way out of your difficulty?' The little woman told her story, to which Miss Roosevelt listened sympathetically. She asked a few questions, but did not suggest any remedy. She went home, however, and did just what I knew she would do: she

W. C. LOFTUS & CO.
Custom Tailoring Only 1187 Broadway, New York

When you visit New York, come in and meet Mr. Loftus told her father. I heard nothing more till I went again to my little dressmaker two weeks later. She was radiant. She said:

"'The most wonderful good luck has befallen me. My big bill has been paid in full, I've settled my interest money, and I'm the happiest woman in this town.'"

Senator P—— spoke up with a twinkle: "It would seem that the old proverb of there being only two perfectly good men, the one who is dead and the one who is unborn, doesn't fit here."

Then he asked me what the smart world was doing now that the trees were all in leaf and the spring sunshine was over all the land.

"Oh," said I, "we're at the stage of the garden parties and outdoor teas at Chevy Chase clubhouse. And, of course, we all of us have been attending Uncle Sam's circus!"

"Circus?" echoed he, puzzled.

"Yes; our Uncle Samuel has been conducting a circus over at Fort Myer that outdoes anything P. T. Barnum or Buffalo Bill ever did in all their lives, and the final exhibition is to be at the Madison Square Garden, New York. Fancy a brawny United States trooper riding six horses bareback and vaulting all six of them as they jump a hurdle at top speed. This is what Trumpeter Fred Mann, of the Second Cavalry, can do, and will do, in Madison Square Garden. Fancy a stolid young Chippewa Indian, who belongs to this famous troop, jumping off and on four horses going at top speed. And when he vaults he turns somersaults that any acrobat might envy. This is what Shawadasa, the Indian, can do. I never saw anything so thrilling in my life, and every man in the whole troop can do these same wonderful things. And the horses are as remarkable as the men. When they form in a cotillon these animals side-step, curvet and bow with as much grace as ballroom belles. You should have seen the expression of pride and delight on Secretary Root's face the other day at this drill at Fort Myer. And General Wood, when the whole troop in squadron front, with drawn sabres, charged down the hall giving the cavalry charge yell which became so famous at San Juan Hill—well, General Wood went quite wild as he joined in the cheer!"

"These riders are wonderful," said the new Member, "and I heard General Wood tell an interesting little thing the other night at the Yale banquet in connection with the organizing of his regiment of Rough Riders. As everybody knows, he had a mixture of cowboys from the West and college men from the East to make up his regiment, and there was a good deal of grumbling among the Western cowboys because, as they expressed it, he had so many gilt-edged dandies along who would not be able to endure anything and weren't worth the powder and shot furnished them. So General Wood kept the men from their respective sections of country apart as much as possible. Well, after the regiment had been organized a while and had drilled, and finally, when they had taken the field and had roughed it a bit, Wood said he was waited on by a delegation of cowboys.

"'Colonel,' said they, 'we want you to divide up those college chaps from the East among us. Give each company an equal quota of them, for they may be gilt-edged dandies, sir, but they're Jim Dandies, all right, and we all want a share of them.'

"So General Wood said he had to parcel out his college men evenly among the cowboys, and right jolly well they got along, too."

"I see," said Senator Blank, who was on the Military Committee, "there is a movement started in army circles to do away with sabres. Field officers say the sword has outlived its usefulness, and is a telltale weapon in the presence of an advancing column, and that for guiding or inspiring troops it could be just as well replaced by a baton or swagger-stick. So the cry is, 'Take away the sword; States can be saved without it.'"

"Goodness," said I, in disgust, "I shall feel like the old lady up in Maine who heard Robert Ingersoll expound his doctrines and declared that if there was to be no hell, fire and brimstone she did not want to live any longer. If there is to be no sword I don't want to live any longer!"

proceeded Thorndyke perceived that the tone and manner of the report were making a strong impression. The matter of it could not be wholly digested, but the manner of presentation commanded attention. Nearly every one of the three hundred and fifty members present saw Thorndyke's fine Italian hand in the business—but the crowd gazed in admiration at the tall and handsome member from Circleville, who was reaping the glory of the present occasion. The reading over, Crane arose, with a few notes in his hand, prepared to defend the report. He was a born speaker, and as soon as he began to talk he forgot his clothes and also made his audience forget them, too. Thorndyke listened with enforced admiration. Crane spoke lucidly, strongly, yet temperately—Thorndyke had taught him the enormous power of moderation. Thorndyke, quite unobserved, watched the faces of the European diplomats in the diplomatic gallery who were listening intently. One man, whom Thorndyke reckoned the ablest diplomat among those representing Western Europe, stealthily took out his handkerchief and wiped his forehead. Another, a round, red-faced, sensible, guileless man, looked about him with a frankly puzzled air, which said as plainly as words, "God bless my soul!—what are we to do about this?" The younger men unconsciously assumed expressions of contempt, indifference and displeasure. They had every reason to be displeased at the turn international affairs were taking—and there was no alternative but war.

Crane spoke for half an hour, his rich, full voice growing richer and fuller, without becoming louder, as he proceeded. At the very end he had allowed himself a little leeway, rightly judging that by that time the audience would be wrought up to the pitch which would permit what is called eloquence. When the last sentences, ringing with terse Americanism, rolled out the effect was magical. A great storm of feeling had been evoked and had responded. The applause was long and loud and deep and steady, like the breaking of ocean waves upon granite rocks. Crane's words had pierced the heart of every American present, and a common impulse brought all of them to their feet. Even the Speaker, not knowing what he was doing, rose from his chair, then sat down again shamefacedly. No one escaped the tumult outwardly except the European occupants of the diplomatic gallery. They were ostentatiously cool, and talked and laughed during the tempest of applause, while secretly they were more agitated than any of the cheering multitude.

The Speaker's gavel descended presently, and quiet was partially restored. Crane was surrounded by members of both parties congratulating him, and he received their praise with a modesty more sincere than was generally believed. But to him had it been brought home that the crisis was bigger than the man, and the people were bigger than the crisis. Thorndyke, sitting near him, had shared in the tempest of feeling, but a sickening disappointment possessed him when he saw Crane's personal triumph. In all of Thorndyke's years of labor Fate had never given him any such a chance as this. But it was his years of labor which made Crane's success possible. He could imagine the turgid, strained spread-eagleism, the powerful but ill-reasoned speech which Crane, but for him, would have made. His eyes, in his cold fit of chagrin, wandered toward the place where Constance Maitland sat. A slender black figure, gracefully holding up the train of the black gown, was just disappearing through the door. Thorndyke's impulse to follow Constance was accentuated by a strong desire, if there should be any debate, to leave Crane to his fate, but he soon found out that the whole matter would go over until the next day, and by that time his better self would assert itself, and he would do his part—not for Crane's sake, but for the sake of that overmastering sense of public duty which he cherished religiously and never alluded to. So, finding himself free and superfluous, he left the chamber, partly to avoid the sight of Crane's triumph and partly drawn by Constance Maitland. Before leaving, however, he went up like a gentleman and congratulated Crane, who, moved by an honest and generous impulse, expressed the utmost gratitude to him.

How Young Men Have Saved for a Home

Ten young men, on salaries of $10 a week and less, tell how they saved and now have their own homes.

On $2.19 a day, his highest wages, one young fellow now owns this $2500 house.

On $45 a month a young man and the girl to whom he was engaged saved for this house.

Started with 3 cents in his pocket to own this $3500 house and lot. Now he does.

Started to save on $35 a month salary. In one year he owned the lot: now he owns the house.

A $3000 house owned by a young man who, at 16, earned $3.75 a week—then started to save.

"I began at 14, at $12 a month. Now I own this $1700 house—all paid for."

Imitation Foods and How They Are Made

By John F. Hobbs

UNITED STATES Senators are not above playing pranks upon each other in much the same manner as they did when schoolboys. A Westerner induced a Southern member of the National upper house to eat some "predigested" alimentary paste with a high-sounding foreign name. He did not recommend a peanut meal substitute because his friend detested peanuts, saying that they ruined his "innerds," which were at that moment in the thrall of a refractory state of indigestion. After dieting on the substance for a time the Missourian, who had noted the improvement in his patient, asked:

"How's your health, Senator?"

"Fine; couldn't be better," was the answer.

"So that peptonized, beef-flavored malt food helped you, after all?"

"It certainly did. I'm not much on these new-fangled things, but this one's O. K. and I thank you for it."

"It's simply a waste product of a peanut-oil mill. I fooled you, old fellow," said the Western Senator jokingly.

"Well, that's good. You fooled me and I fooled my gastronomy. It's a faith cure," he replied, and both laughed heartily over the incident.

The digestion, after all, seems to be largely a dupe of the sight, the olfactory nerves and the taste. These tell the gastric machinery to get to work, and it obeys, whatever the material is at hand. The brewery analyst has even threatened to upset our ancient beliefs in meat extracts with a "similar" or "just as good" extract made from the residue of the brewing vats. The malt and hop waste has been found to contain much of the flavor and properties of real beef. The brewery chemist thus imperils the popularity of the real roast-beef sandwich with a brewery waste substitute, by inducing the drinker of the beer also to chew up the discarded pap of malt and hops.

Our Four-Legged Chickens

The brewery does not have as much effect upon the beef industry, however, as that and the hog industry have upon chicken soups and deviled crabs. A New England farmer, after hauling his swine products to a near-by canning factory, was surprised to learn that his canned chicken soups and deviled chicken were mostly hog and flavoring devices. The poultry meat cost about fifty per cent. more than the swine flesh. That explained why the factory needed mostly four-legged chickens. The neighbor of this farmer supplied pumpkins for a "selected ripe fruit" marmalade and jam factory which turned out a highly labeled product in jars, earthen vessels and otherwise. He said to the manager one day:

"I fetch loads o' pumpkins, potatoes an' turnips in here, but th' hull output o' y'r fact'ry's fruit stuffs."

"We ship the other stuff abroad," was the evasive reply.

Pure fruit jam retails at twenty-two cents a twelve-ounce jar. Ten-cent jams have a mere trace of fruit. No kitchen worries the manufacturer or the merchant because the jelly won't jell; a coagulator made of alum and sulphuric acid attends to that. For red fruits the proper color is added. A sweetening made from coal tar is also added. A tiny bottle of it contains the equivalent of five hundred pounds of sugar, not glucose, for glucose is not sweet, as is commonly supposed.

The jellies are made as already explained, and the jams of any old thing. Apple "juice," for instance, is made from the cores and skins of apples. The "wild" cherry in your cordial is nothing but a composition of glucose, vegetable color and sweetened water flavored with oil of bitter almonds; and the same ingredients, flavored with orris-root, produce violet syrup, and the same again, flavored with oil of lemon grass, make the lemon syrup with which your last soda was very likely flavored. These ugly facts are not helped by the knowledge that any chemical which will prevent fruit or fruit juices from fermenting in a barrel or other inclosure will prevent them from being digested when eaten.

When the ladies at a five-o'clock tea turn to scandal, over the delicate aroma of a highly flavored Asiatic tea or a cup of Mocha, they little suspect that the delicious brew is a

"THE WHIP HAND"

A STORY OF LUMBER
By Samuel Merwin

Joint author (with Henry K. Webster) of "Calumet K" and "The Short Line War," and author of "B. Carter," and "The Road to Frontenac"

MR. MERWIN is one of a great trio of authors, including Henry K. Webster and the late Frank Norris, who have created the modern "business story" of the type represented by "The Banker and the Bear," "The Copper King," "The Pit" and "Calumet K." Mr. Merwin spends months preparing the material for his great stories, often putting on overalls and engaging as a common laborer in order to make sure of accuracy of detail. The results of such work form the closest representations of modern business and industrial life of America, with its many Titanic conflicts between trusts and individuals, that are found in literature. Such stories do more to give a young man a knowledge of business and equip him for the struggles to come than any amount of ordinary "book learning."

Mr. Merwin's new story is by far the strongest he has ever written. In the illustration above, the well-groomed gentleman on the right is a Chicago banker and promoter who plans a great combination of lumber concerns around the Lakes. The sturdy young man on the left, not long out of college, is manager of one lumber firm which declines to be "taken into camp." The banker is backed by millions of money—the young man by a sweetheart who believes in him. The fight which follows is fierce,—dramatic,—full of the unexpected,—intensely American throughout.

fruitful outlet for surplus peas and beans, and for nondescript weeds properly "doctored." Mrs. Blank, a prominent Swedish lady in New York City, would not believe that the coffee she used at a recent coffee party was merely a jellified pulp of sweet potatoes or other vegetable matter, stamped in a bean mould after being properly flavored, labeled "coffee" by courtesy, and sold at a price sufficiently high to win the imagination to its support and to command respect for its virtue.

Coffee from the Potato Patch

Dried cubes of sweet potatoes, roasted peanut meal and similar vegetable substances are not only adulterants in but, often, the main body of many reputable brands of ground coffee. Mrs. Blank had a scientific friend, a well-known food chemist, who verified the facts of the coffee "fakes." What she didn't half like about it, however, was the fact that a social rival who was a connoisseur of teas, had sprung the joke on her at her own coffee party, to the intense delight of the other ladies. Her analytical friend had said as disreputable things about ambrosial teas as he had about coffees, so she determined to even up matters. A little return social tea afforded the opportunity. Mrs. Blank purchased the excellently flavored leaf which the chemist suggested and the expert pronounced it "really delicious." The package, produced at her request, disclosed the fact that the "gunpowder" was a "noted English" brand reputed to be "affected at Windsor Castle." These facts—on the label—confirmed the lady in the accuracy of her judgment. She was even vulgar enough to sniff the vapor of her cup by way of further verification. "Horror!" she exclaimed a week later, when the laboratory man, to decide a friendly wager between the ladies, said: "Contaminated with stems, husks and similar refuse." He had examined some other samples of tea for outside clients and assured his fair visitors that in some of those there was "the presence also of a few chopped up hairs in the samples, charitably interpreted as being accidentally there. There is a large admixture of foreign leaves. The amount of theine in these samples is very small." Of one popular brand of medium-priced tea he said: "Though highly flavored, it is an absolute fraud." In a footnote was the following comment: "The facing of tea should be prohibited on account of its being injurious."

"I think housekeepers should know these things," said the lady with the sensitive tea nose. The "lady delegation," as the man of science afterward called the intruders, insisted on ransacking the place and knowing everything. "Because," as one of them put it, "they might adulterate anything and fool anybody."

"They do in the case of most cheap and medium-priced articles," assented the chemist, hauling down everything in sight as though he might have at some period of his life been a clerk behind the counter of a fashionable dry-goods store. "Now, there's the left-over quantities of nearly three hundred samples of foods and things taken at random from grocery stores as they run in both the humble and the aristocratic districts. The majority of them are either wholly or partly spurious."

The ladies puckered their mouths, arched their eyebrows and looked at each other.

Counterfeit Cocoas and Chocolates

"Now," continued the chemist with a smile, "Mrs. A—— buys this cocoa. It is a rank fraud, a compound of sugar, arrowroot and a percentage of flavored cocoa with a cheaper oil substituted for its own which is extracted for more expensive uses. This chocolate has lost its cocoa butter, cheaper oil replacing the extracted oily matter."

The ladies further learned that cream of tartar may be adulterated with starch; that much Cayenne pepper is made from garden seeds, flavored with pepper and then colored; that other peppers are often simply ground husks, or cornmeal, cocoanut hulls, or any old thing for a body, flavored; that apple butters are often composed of molasses and flour made tart with tartaric acid; that there are strawberry and other jams containing nothing but vegetable fibres, grass-seed and glucose—their flavor being effected with compound ethers, and glucose made from cornstarch, bleached with blue coloring matter, as a laundryman does a shirt, and sold for crystallized cane sugar. The demonstrator then made some of the imitations described for his guests. He also tickled their palates with an impromptu decoction sold all overthe country as "Ohio," "Rhine" and "California" wines. It was a mixture of prune juice, water and saccharine, with salicylic acid added to keep them alive. Mustard is seldom met with which has all of its fixed and volatile oils present; often no starch turmeric is present. The extracted oil of the nutmeg is a valuable agent in the manufacture of ground mace. The cake is then ground up and sold for genuine nutmeg.

The inventors of the wooden nutmeg and of the "brummagem" ham may have been clever in their day, but they are back numbers in this age of ingenious food sharps.

They are not a circumstance to the fellows, unearthed by the Georgia Legislature some years ago, who heavily influenced their flour with Tennessee kaolin. This deposit soon found itself in red-hot competition with potato meal as a flour adulterant. One might even stand a limited dosing of sawdust, potato flour and grainless white soil mixtures if his digestive apparatus were allowed to escape the penalties of the hundred and one other sophistications of food products which, with the aid of seductive names and ambrosial odors, entice him into dyspepsia. With the ground under the lemon trees of Florida covered with rotting lemons one would not expect to find his "extract of lemon" cheapened with oil of limes and sugar. And the housewife who sniffs "something queer" in her "extract of Vanilla" half detects the fact that she nearly discovered its extract of tonka bean. Vanilline, glycerine and caromel help to bolster up other well-known extracts used in the culinary economy.

If the hens only knew that a dangerous chemical called, in the bakery trade, "egg yellow," is used by some bakers to imitate the color of eggs and to dispense with the use of eggs in the cheaper cakes, there would be a barn riot. The consumer might join in when made aware of the fact that very few cheap cakes ever see an egg. The dear old cow has had so many nice things said about her and lived above reproach so long that her milk seems always pure. But a young mother who bought a four-ounce can of "condensed milk" marked "Pure Jersey," and diluted it for her infant offspring, had her abiding faith badly shaken. The cream sank when in fluid form, and its place at the top of the vessel was taken by a cheap oily substance which the manufacturer had incorporated in the mass to give it a greasy consistency. It was mainly a composition of cornstarch paste colored to the richness of "Jersey" cream. There are other chalk milks with a very delicate coal-tar hue. The city folks are not the only ones who have their lacteal troubles. The countryman also has them.

The Bunco Man a Back Number

Here is an instance. A Southern farmer read the following advertisement in a Western paper: "Send five dollars and learn how to get a pound of butter out of a quart of milk." He sent the money and received his recipe: "Take a pan and pour a quart of milk into it, having first placed a pound of butter in the centre of the pan. Lift the butter out." As clear a case of "gold brick" as this seems to be, it has been outdone by a Canadian who came to the United States in 1892 and copyrighted an "expander" or "increaser," which, where the bunco man only got a pound of butter out of a quart of milk, takes butter, milk and all out in the form of butter. It even does more. It takes six pounds of butter, six pounds of rich cream and gets thirteen and one-half pounds of butter out of the mass. The little emulsifying joker in the case is a mixture of pepsin, salt and color matter. Another is composed of eighty-three per cent. of salt, fifteen per cent. of annatto and two per cent. of rennet and organic matter. In 1901 the Iowa Agricultural College found the "expander" doing business in that State. A farmer who saw the professor take six pounds of good butter, six pounds of good ripe cream, churn them together and, after washing the result in water, letting it stand a while, get thirteen and one-half pounds of butter, exclaimed: "B'Gosh! It collars the hull outfit, milk, butter, water and all." A Wisconsin cheesemaker, who was present, observed that "while the butter man only gets the fat out of milk, the cheese man the fat and the casein, the 'expander' gobbles up fat, casein, sugar, water and all for butter."

If you do not know what you are buying or the character of what you are eating it makes no difference. The sensitive aristocrat who disdains to imitate his plebeian brother in buying peanuts from an Italian peddler loses the edge of his supersensitiveness when the little nut is insinuated into him in the form of health breads, breakfast foods, spices, butter, flesh and other table articles.

$1.75 BUYS A DRESS HAT YOUR MILLINER WOULD CHARGE $5.00 FOR.

Cut this ad. out and send to us, enclose $1.75 and we will send you this beautiful, stylish dress hat by express. Your choice, if you do not say it is more stylish, more dressy, more becoming, a handsomer hat than your milliner could possibly design and make at any such price, and if you do not say it is worth from $4.00 to $5.00, you can return it to us at our expense and we will immediately return your money. THIS IS A GENUINE PARISIAN PATTERN HAT, the most stylish and exclusive design for the Spring and Summer of 1903. A beautiful, tucked black silk chiffon hat, real French frame, a very becoming low shape, the very newest style, made of the best tucked black silk chiffon, slightly raised on the left side and drooping in the back. The trimming on the top consists of two large clusters of crushed muslin pink June roses and foliage effectively arranged on both sides of the brim. On either side of the brim in front are two cut steel cabachon buckles. The lining as well as the rolling brim is overlaid with closely pleated black silk chiffon, while the low crown is covered with a plaque of fancy lace straw braid. The entire hat is draped with a very elegant black silk chiffon veil, trimmed on the ends with three rows of fluted black silk, the same falling in graceful effect over the back. A large velvetta bandeau garnished with crushed muslin pink June roses completes the trimming of this stunning hat. This New Stunning Parisian Pattern Hat is equally becoming to young and old, and carries a distinctiveness in style and workmanship such as can be had only from the hands of fashionable city milliners. You can tell at once it was never produced by any small city or town milliner. Can be ordered in black or any other color desired. Order today and wear the handsomest hat in your town. Professor Dillpicker's Discovery

By Hayden Carruth

A ROMANCE OF THE DIGITALIS FLYING FROG WHICH HAD HAM-BONES FOR CLAWS

IT APPEARED that another very remarkable character was a certain wandering scientist named Dillpicker. His stay was short, according to the account of Mr. Milo Bush, but long enough to impress its details vividly upon the memory of this repository of local history. Reference being made to electricity, Mr. Bush spun off the following:

Bet you a pair o' new boots that if old Perfessor Dillpicker was here he could tell you all about it. Told me himself that he'd handled electricity so much that he could take hold of a live wire sizzling with ten thousand bolts of the stuff and never feel it. Explained it by saying that it was just like a man used to keeping bees not being afraid of their stings. Though electricity wasn't the Perfessor's strongholt, either, the same being rocks and these here leather-covered perhistoric animals which used to stand around this country solemn, wearing other critters' tails and misfit trunks, and always took themselves apart 'fore they went to bed at night and gener'ly got themselves put together wrong the next morning.

I sha'n't never forget the day that Perfessor Dillpicker arrove. He comes into Shanks' and says he: "Sir, may I ask if fozzles abound in this neighborhood?" "We ain't been troubled with 'em much this season," says Shanks. The man looks at Shanks with his round eyes, and strokes his long whiskers sort o' gentle, and says he after a minute, "Ah, yes;" then he turns to the rest of us around the stove and goes on: "Gentlemen, my name is Dillpicker. I am sent out by Smithington's Institootion, of Washington, D. C., to examine the guological formation in this region and make a collection of the fozzle remains of the perhistoric animals."

"Stranger," says Abner Blackmark, "Al Doty's your man. He's got more'n five hundred dorgs and a'tame coon."

"The dorg is not a perhistoric animal," says the man, "though he is represented in the past ages, like the hoss. Did you ever stop to think, gentlemen, that the hoss formerly had five toes, though he now has but one?"

"When I was down at the county fair last fall," says Jap Bingerford, "I bet some good money on a hoss that didn't have no toes at all, jedging from the place he occerpied at the end of the race. Would you like that there hoss for your collection, Stranger?"

"Oh, no," says the Perfessor. "Wot I propose doing is going up here in the gulch and examining your rocks, and if I can find any fozzles, shipping the same to the mooseum of the institootion which I represent. Wot I specially would like to secure is remains of the great Winklesaurus, of which you will find a picture in this book. See page 147." And he pulls out a book and passes it around for us to see.

Well, as I said, there was the most cur'ous animals in that book. Says Abner Blackmark: "Wot might this critter be that's setting down and sticking his nose up in the air like a 'Piscopal church steeple?"

"Ah, yes," says the Perfessor; "the Dinklestrobashus, percusser of the modern cow. It was much larger than the present cow, however, as the perhistoric hoss was smaller than the present hoss. Multichudinous are the changes worked by the slow processes of time, gentlemen. A vast many of these beasts have become extinct entirely. And the same changes are still going on. Everlution is capable of all things. Forty million years ago the whale, mighty leviathank of the juberous deep, was a small animal about the size of the weasel, and run about these parts on four legs and lived in a hole in the ground."

"I'd never a-thought it," says Abner.

"It is science which reveals to us the wonders of the yearth," says the Perfessor. "See page 236." And we looked and found a critter built like a hot-water bag and with an extensive snout. "That animal," goes on the Perfessor, "is the original of the present swine. He was over two hundred feet long, exclusive of his proboscus, with which he used to pluck fruit from the highest trees. See wot the noble critter has become—small, and squealing, and rooting in the yearth, and breaking out of his pen and not being able to find the hole to get back in even with help."

We looked at the pictures some more, and then says the Perfessor:

"As I told you, I have come out here in the interest of science. I have took a cabin up here in the gulch so as to be near my work. My funds," goes on he, turning to Shanks, "is ample, supplied by the Government, but not at the moment available, the Government sending out its drafts quarterly. If I could get you to advance me a little pork and such foodstuffs I should take it very kindly and you could feel that you were helping on'ard the great cause of scientific research. I do not require much. A ham, a peck of beans, and a few such things."

Shanks said it was all right, him being always ready to h'ist along science, and the Perfessor took wot he could carry and went up the gulch. After which we seen very little of him except when he come in for supplies, which was frequent.

It run along most of the summer and every time we seen the Perfessor we asked him if he was having any luck. "Very little," he always said. "Fozzles are skeerce. But I do not despair of yet making a valuable discovery. I have found a footprint of the mighty Digitalis, porkotype of our present bullfrog, which had wings and a long bill, and flew over the primeval landscape uttering squawks which shook the coal trees of the period and caused the perhistoric mother to clasp her epizootic infant to her buzzum."

We sot silent for some moments. It was Shanks' voice which broke the stillness. "This here flying bullfrog had a long bill, you say, do you, Perfessor?" says he.

"Outrageous long," answers the Perfessor. "Which I am some like him," says Shanks, cold and icy. "Agin you, Perfessor; mostly for hams."

"Mr. Shanks," says the Perfessor, "on the eve of a great scientific discovery is it a fit time to lug in a mercenary ham bill?"

"You drawed it too strong on them flying bullfrogs," says Shanks. "I don't believe no such varmints ever lived."

"Sir!" says the Perfessor in a voice of thunder, rising up and throwing back his shoulders. "You audacious tradesman! You groveling shopkeeper! See page 314!" Which we done, and sure enough there was the flying bullfrogs.

The next morning he was back all excited. "Gentlemen," says he, "I have found it. Some bones of the Digitalis, the first ever discovered, the mighty-winged bullfrog which sailed through the hazy vault of the carboniferous sky uttering anon his sweet song or his harsh snort which caused the caveman to shudder in his cavern. I cannot wait for my draft now—I must on to Washington."

He had a box under his arm and we asked him if we might see the fozzle bones. He took off the cover and we looked at 'em, pretty clayey and sandy.

"All peterfied by time, of course," says he. "They are small, being only the clawbones at the end of the wings, but from them the experts can restore the whole animal. I go, but I will return. Adoo!"

That afternoon a boy come in with the Perfessor's box, which he had found just below town, aside the railroad track.

Shanks pulls off the cover and empties out the fozzles. Then he looks at 'em close and straightens up and says:

"That there wonderful Digitalis bullfrog was not so good a flier as the Perfessor. Them are the bones from my hams. See page 40 of my account book—$37.50 owing for them hams and ecksetery."

How to Paint a House Cheap

And Have it Guaranteed to Look Better, Wear Longer and Cost Less Than the Best White Lead Paints

Never Fades, Cracks, Chalks, Peels or Blisters and is Not Affected by Gases. Fifty Sample Colors and Illustrated Booklet Prepaid to Any Address Absolutely Free.

The cost of painting the house and barn, outbuildings and fences is a heavy burden. Cheap paints soon fade, peel or scrape off and white lead and oil costs so much and has to be replaced so often that it is a constant expense to keep the bright, clean appearance so desirable in the cozy cottage home or the elegant mansion. The following are a few of the large users of Carrara Paint:

The Waldorf-Astoria, New York, One of the Most Magnificent Hotels in the World, Has Used Tons and Tons of the World-Famous Carrara Paint.

Pennsylvania R. R. Co.; Pullman Palace Car Co.; Chicago Telephone Co.; Central Union Telephone Co.; Field Museum, Chicago; Kenwood Club, Chicago; Cincinnati Southern; C. & E. I. R. R. Co.; Denver & Rio Grande R. R.; Wellington Hotel, Chicago, and thousands of private residences and buildings, public and private, all over the country. From railroad box car to elegantly furnished general offices of the great railways; from race track fences and stables to fancy club house; from plain brick walls and stone fences to tin roofs and interior finish of stately hotels; from country barn or hay shed or cheap outbuilding to farm residence, suburban home or luxurious city residence.

Carrara is used because it lasts longer, never fades, never cracks, never blisters, never peels, covers more surface than the highest-priced paints and costs less than the cheap mixed paints that injure instead of protect. There is but one Carrara. It is made by the Carrara Paint Agency, General Offices, 901 Carrara Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and anyone having a house to paint should send for 50 free sample colors and our handsome booklet, showing many buildings reproduced in all the colors just as they are painted from this great paint that has stood the most rigid tests for 25 years and, bear in mind, that it is the only paint ever manufactured that is backed by a positive guarantee in every case. Distributing depots in all principal cities. Write to-day and save half your paint bills in the future.

Mortgages Net 5%
In North Dakota

A 5 per cent. investment, if it is safe and prompt in its returns, is considered gilt edged nowadays.

All the favorable conditions — low and steadily advancing prices on land, absolute security and the certainty of returns obtain in North Dakota.

These gilt-edged investments can be had here under the most satisfying conditions.

The time to take advantage of them is now. This is the day of your opportunity.

I can furnish them to you, together with the most satisfying evidence that they are absolutely trustworthy.

I would be glad to have you make the most careful and scrutinizing search of my record, find out whether I will do just as I agree to or not, and then find out if the mortgage securities I offer for sale are the kind described as gilt edged or not.

If you find them gilt edged, as you are bound to, I will be glad to sell them to you, collect the interest and forward it and personally look after the investments.

You will find me safe, honorable, reliable and responsible. I will see to it that you do not regret making an investment in North Dakota.

Interest and principal collected without expense. Remittances in New York exchange.

UNSOLVED
Wisset's Will

which had no association with him and then I entered the room where he had died. As I stood there I had what I may describe as a vivid sense of the man who was in my thoughts. I do not mean that I saw or felt or heard anything, but only that I seemed to be in his environment. I was uncomfortable and left the room, passing through the little dressing-room into his sitting-room. When I went over to the window, that window at which the things had happened, perhaps it was inevitable and did not mean anything that my sense of Wisset deepened. When I laid my hand upon the window cord, as usual the blind wouldn't move, and when I seized it by the lath and shook it in order to make it start my hand trembled, which I think was quite natural, and I could not help looking over my shoulder. The blind went up at last and I looked round the room where I was convinced the secret, if there was any secret, must be found. The sense of something was strong upon me and I was tempted at one moment to clear out; but it seemed absurd to be afraid, in the sitting-room of a middle-class house at nine o'clock on an April morning. If it had been ten-forty-five at night inside that room it would have been another matter. I began to argue the case out along this line: that Wisset was devoted, although he would not acknowledge it, to his nephew; that in a fit of disappointment he had left his money past his nephew to those dirty Afghans; that he had repented it, and, as I guessed, had corrected that will; that he could not tell us where the paper was, and that now, if I could depend upon what I saw, he returned about the hour of his death to keep his vigil. And then I argued further that when he turned from the window with that pathetic look it was to get that paper, and if so, it was in the room.

"I had an hour to spare before patients came, and I determined to do what I could with that room. I hung my coat at the back of a door where Wisset used to keep an old jacket, and looked round the room. Really there did not seem a hole where any one could hide even a slender paper. There was a stone mantelpiece, but there was no crack between it and the wall; there were, of course, no shutters — the house was too recent for that — behind which anything could be hid; the hearthstone had not been moved, and it was certain nothing would be hidden up the chimney because any paper would have been burned. There only remained the skirting boards and the floor. And now I noticed something about the floor which struck me and seemed to give a clue. The floor had been covered with brown paper laid beneath the carpet, and this paper had not been removed, although here and there it had slipped from its place and was ruffled. In one corner, however, it was all gone and the floor was bare; it seemed also as if the dust had been brushed away. Three boards' breadth was clear and clean. I knelt down and examined the wood, and I found that instead of a nail holding down one board a screw nail had been put in. When I looked closely at it I saw that it was braised and evidently had been frequently removed.

"What I am going to say now I could not prove to you even if you were kneeling with me over that board, and I do not know that I am sure of it myself, but there were signs to my mind as if some one who had no screwdriver and could do nothing with the nail had been trying to raise the nail with his fingers. But it would be quite open to say that the scratches had been caused by the frequent lifting of the board and I cannot press that point, but I have my imagination. As I became in youth the proud possessor of one of those marvelous knives which fit you for every emergency — and indeed would enable you to live on a desert island — which I have been careful to carry ever since as a link of the days of long ago, I had no difficulty in drawing the screw nail. It was then possible to raise the board a few inches and to insert my hand. At first I found nothing, but when I stretched a little farther I came on a packet, and I must say I drew it out with considerable satisfaction and expectation. It was wrapped in brown paper and tied with tape, and I ask the hearty admiration of this company when I tell you that I mastered my curiosity, which was certainly quite as keen as any woman's ever could be, and resolved to keep the packet intact and to hand it over to be opened by the lawyer. What I may have prescribed for my patients that morning and what I may have said to them about their illnesses I do not care to inquire, but I grudged every moment till I was able to place the papers in the hand of Jeremiah's lawyer and ask him to examine them. It was a disappointment to find that they consisted of about five thousand pounds' worth of American railway bonds which, for some reason we could not guess, Wisset had hidden away in this place; for this would mean only so much more money for the officials and the faddists, and would bring no inheritance to Stokes, and, I was also convinced, no relief to Wisset's troubled soul. I was explaining what I had hoped when the lawyer cried, 'Hello! here is a letter in one of the bonds,' and I should like to have taken my pulse when he opened the envelope, took out a sheet of notepaper and read:

> "'I, Jeremiah Wisset, being in full possession of my senses, but believing that I may not live long, do hereby revoke and declare of none effect that portion of my will which donates the residue of my estate, after the payment of certain legacies, to the Society for the Restoration of the Ten Tribes to the Holy Land, and I do now bequeath all of which I may be possessed at the hour of death, after the payment of the said legacies, to my nephew, Captain Stokes, because I have always loved him, and because he has done so well in Egypt.
> JEREMIAH WISSET.'

"'He might have used me,' said the lawyer with a slight asperity in his tone, 'instead of trying to do this himself, but I fancy he hated the idea of giving in and coming round to my view of things, for I had said what I thought about the Afghans. Stand in the courts? Oh, yes. It is perfectly clear what he intended and he only intended what was just, and in such circumstances an English judge always decides what is equitable. It is a mercy the Afghan people have not yet received a single penny from the estate, and I don't think they will need to appoint any more secretaries. Wisset has behaved like a trump, after all, and I don't see why Kinnish and I should not write to-day and let Captain Stokes know what his uncle thought of him and what he has done for him.' But for reasons which I leave to your imagination I did not say a word to the lawyer about the face at the window. I mentioned only my casual observation of a screw nail."

Our Wonderful Walnut Crop

CALIFORNIA'S production of English walnuts, which are more correctly known as Persian walnuts, has been increasing at a marvelous rate during the past few years. In 1895 the crop amounted to 6,770,000 pounds; in 1900 it was 10,860,000 pounds, and in 1902 it reached the astonishing figure of 17,500,000 pounds. Such quantities are hard to grasp, but the size of the output for 1902 will be better realized when it is explained that the crop for that year filled eight hundred and seventy-five freight cars, each of which held ten tons. The almonds raised in California in 1902 filled two hundred and eighty ten-ton cars.

The production of "Madeira nuts," as walnuts of this kind were called a generation ago, is increasing at such a rate that before long the domestic supply will suffice for our own markets, which as yet depend to a considerable extent on importations from Spain, Portugal, and particularly the Island of Madeira. They get their name of "English walnuts" from the fact that they pass through the hands of British merchants on their way to the United States.

The great difficulty that has had to be overcome in the growing of walnuts in California is the fertilizing of the flowers of the trees, but it has been found that, when black walnuts or even common butternuts are planted in the orchards here and there, their more plentiful pollen serves to impregnate the blossoms of the English walnuts, which otherwise might remain to a very large extent infertile.

It is believed that before very long this country will be shipping English walnuts abroad, and the same is likely to be the case with almonds, of which immense crops are now produced in Arizona as well as in California. Almonds require a dry climate, and do not thrive east of the Rocky Mountains, because of the frosts and dampness. It is customary to bleach the nuts before sending them to market, the light color thus given rendering them more attractive to the eye.

All meals served in dining cars form only one of the advantages of summer tours via the

IF RUSSELL SAGE TOLD YOU

That You Could Make a Fortune in BROOKLYN REAL ESTATE,

Wouldn't you be impressed? Especially if it were to cost you but $10 down and $6 a month till you'd paid only $510—wouldn't you act upon it?

Well, just read Mr. Sage's own words. We might naturally be considered as biased in our opinion—of painting New York's future in too rosy colors—but listen!

Here's the Opinion and Advice of One of the World's Greatest Investors and Financiers

Whose Reputed Wealth is ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS

(From the New York World of September 28th, 1902.)

"I do not think the future of New York can be depicted in terms any too glowing. The most fanciful writers cannot exaggerate the greatness of its future.

"A man who buys real estate in any of the five boroughs—of course exercising average good judgment—has a fortune before him. Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year.

"Young man, buy real estate, in the outlying boroughs, and then work hard at your usual avocation. Your real estate purchases will make your old age comfortable." RUSSELL SAGE.

YOU can take advantage of Mr. Sage's advice now—it's within the reach and means of every reader of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. We offer you, in the greatest of the outlying boroughs, the best property that the man of moderate means can possibly secure to-day. It's because our property is located in Brooklyn, that Mr. Sage's remark—"Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year"—becomes specially significant. Think of it! Three-fourths of all Greater New York's enormous increase in population—75% of the growth of all the "five boroughs" is poured into Brooklyn.

HIS WORD FOR IT, it will pay you to at least look into this. He says: "Of course exercising average good judgment." That is precisely what we say, and don't you think you'll be using good judgment to buy where 5500 resident and non-resident investors bought $4,660,000 worth of lots during the past fourteen months and over eight million dollars' worth in the last four years? Hundreds of persons who purchased through the mails have been here to inspect their holdings, and 75 per cent. of those who were in a financial position to do so, at least doubled their original purchase. Could there be a better indorsement than this? We know, any one who investigates it will know, you can know, that we have the greatest proposition in real estate ever made to the public, and that if you buy here and now, perhaps

You Have a Fortune Before You!

To keep in touch with the marvelous growth of New York at the present time, her tremendous building operations and almost incredible expansion, is to be convinced that her Brooklyn development must bring to the investor of to-day, within a very few years, thousands of dollars for his hundreds invested. The completion of the new bridges and tunnels now under way will mark a mighty advance in Brooklyn's population and upbuilding, with corresponding increase of land values. Our property is in the section first affected by this stimulus, and even now showing greatest activity. It is right on the edge of the "density belt" which is rapidly overtaking and surrounding us.

BEN-HUR FLOUR

Dough Boys at the Circus

"Oh, Dough Boys," cried the Boneless Man,
"Come beat my acting if you can."
"Indeed we will," was their shrill cry"
"We'll do it and we wont half try."
Then, rushing to the circus rings,
They did the most amazing things.

THEIR legs and arms in knots they tied,
O'er their own necks they walked astride,
They rolled as hoops, till all the tent
Was lost in silent wonderment.
And all the crowd when they were through,
Thrice cheered the Ben-Hur Dough Boy crew.

The above is an extract from "The Dough Boys at the Circus".

We will send FREE the entire book containing all the adventures of this rollicking crew, with bright color pictures to entertain and delight the children, if you will give us your name and address and the card or bill head of one grocer in your town who does not sell BEN-HUR FLOUR.

The Fair-Play Department

By William Allen White

WHAT THE NEW DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR IS DESIGNED TO DO, WHAT POWERS IT IS GRANTED AND WHAT MEN WILL HAVE IT IN CHARGE

IN EVERY American town of over a quarter of a million people stands a big, gaudy hotel. It is generally decorated in a somewhat rococo style; and electricity and gilded stucco have belizened its restaurant until the room recalls the old phrase, "a gilded palace of sin." The bill of fare of this restaurant advertises nothing less than half a dollar, and no dish of any consequence costs less than a dollar. From a dollar a portion the viands rise in price to five dollars. An abstemious person may satisfy a rape-seed-cuttle-bone-pepper-grass appetite for a dollar and a half or two dollars, but a hungry man with a moderate thirst should bid farewell to the business half of five dollars. And yet there was a time in the memory of men now living, and of military age, when the standard price for a meal all over this broad land was twenty-five cents, when a fifty-cent meal was regarded as rather roguishly extravagant, and when a dollar table d'hôte dinner symbolized all that was prodigally lavish, if not criminally luxurious, in American life. But in these daubed and dazzling restaurants aforesaid scores of young men and women sit night after night, and gorge and guzzle and gibber, and occasionally a fat, wet-eyed, short-breathed old fellow or his widowed sister sits long after respectable bedtime stirring the dregs of youth in an empty, cheerless cup. The average woman in the place wears something over two hundred dollars' worth of clothes, and carries perhaps a thousand dollars' worth of jewels, and the waiters' check which the average man pays after the night's groceries debauch is so indecently high that it is hardly proper to speak of it in mixed company! Night after night, month after month and year after year this has been going on, the standard of extravagance gradually rising. In the larger American cities there are not merely one or two or a score, but miles and scores of miles, all told, of residences that rent for ten thousand dollars a year each. Except in the country, the family that does not spend twenty-five thousand dollars a year may count itself among the worthy poor.

Now we are in the seven fat years and we do not notice these things. No one is hungry, no one is miserable, and no one keeps books on the ladies and gentlemen who are going the pace. Their gait is commonly reckoned as no one's business but their own, which reckoning is wrong. For we are all in the same boat; and if every one aboard doesn't pull his weight, or give value received, he is cheating his passage. The thing we call society—that is, the compact to live equitably and at peace in this world—only collects its bills on an empty stomach. And at such times it is irritable and often takes more than those who have should pay—witness the French Revolution. But society does collect its bills, keep its accounts, and run the social compact fairly. And in America there is a race sense of the amenities which revolts at a nasty, mussy revolution, and demands laws and decrees of the courts. And a curious thing about the American demand for reformatory laws is this: that when the demand is least clamorous the laws are likely to be most searching and severe and effective. Ten years ago, or so, there was a yowl of protest against the rich growing richer and the poor poorer; there was a popular craze lapsing into hysteria about the encroachment of wealth. Nothing came of it all. But, after the noise of the claque ceased, the real public sentiment became manifest, and at the last half of the latest session of Congress a law was made which, when it becomes active, will go into the hitherto sacredly inviolable field of business and put it under Government espionage and control as closely as the coining of money and the carrying of mail are under it to-day. The law referred to is the law creating the Department of Commerce. It will be the bookkeeper of society. Eventually, through this department, the Government of the United States will say whether those who are going the pace, who are raising the standard of extravagance, who are rocking the economic boat, are, in truth, earning their passage; whether they are giving society value received. If they are not they will have to fish or cut bait. This does not mean that the Government of the United States, through its Department of Commerce, is going to be a leveler; this does not mean that the Government will tear down any structure—however high—from a sound foundation—and there are thousands of such; the purpose of this new law, which few people understand, not even many of those who made it, nor those who are appointed to execute it, seems to be, as nearly as all hands can define it, to establish an umpire over commerce and to prevent cheating in the game. No one objects to a man or a corporation making any sum, however vast, if it is made honestly. No one cares how much a man spends or his wife spends or his imbecile children spend if the money came into the man's hands in return for some actual service to society.

The Umpire of the Business Game

THE fool and his money are soon parted. But what society does not like is to see the fool parting with some one's money besides his own, which he has obtained by selling the thing he did not have. It is not the fool that makes men angry by his folly: it is the fool who is a thief, pretending to be an honest gentleman. The Department of Commerce, by pricking the bubble of business shams, through merciless publicity, will put the person who misappropriates and misapplies money, whether of stockholders or depositors or creditors of any sort, upon exactly the social and moral plane with the man who hypothecates a horse. So, therefore, if the persons who fill the restaurants and corridors of these vulgar hotels come by their money honestly, the law which established this Department of Commerce will protect them while they eat themselves into early graves; but if they got their money by smooth deals or shrewd transactions the law will beckon them outside.

Now all this may not be accomplished this year, nor next, nor the year after, for this business, existing to-day, has been a thousand years growing. It may not be uprooted with a simple twist of the wrist, even if uprooting is necessary to correct its crookedness. It will take many years of hard work, and honest work, and brave work by the Government to straighten the kinks, but the important thing has been accomplished when Congress by law declares that it shall be done. It will be interesting to look at the law which Congress passed with this straightening intention. Technically the law is known as "An act to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor." The first section of the act provides for the salary of the Secretary of the Department and makes him a Cabinet officer. The second section prescribes the help he shall have and what certain of his helpers and assistants shall do. The third section of the act might be called the assembling section, for it calls from the other Departments of the Government a number of bureaus and commissions and makes them a part of the Department of Commerce and Labor. These assembled parts are as follows: The Lighthouse Board, the Lighthouse Establishment, the Steamboat Inspection Service, the Bureau of Navigation, the United States Shipping Commissioners, the National Bureau of Standards, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Commissioner-General of Immigration, the immigration service at large, and the Bureau of Statistics, the Census Office and all that pertains to it, the Department of Labor, the Fish Commission and the Office of Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries. The Bureau of Foreign Commerce, now in the Department of State, is made a part of the Bureau of Statistics, hereinbefore transferred from the Department of the Treasury. Jurisdiction over the Alaskan fisheries is transferred to the new department, as also is jurisdiction over matters pertaining to exclusion of the Chinese. The fifth section of the act creating the new Department seems to establish a bureau of industrial promotion. The terms of the act are not exactly lucid, and custom and tradition will settle the meaning of the law; probably the lawmakers expected this bureau to do for manufacturers what the Department of Agriculture has done for the farmers, stock raisers and fruit growers: to provide new markets for stuff produced, to guarantee the quality of the product, to introduce possible new products, and to show the American manufacturing world such opportunities and openings as the consular agents of the Government may see all over the globe. So far there is nothing in the act to disturb the peaceful sleep of the financial octopus—but section six contains the stinger. This section provides for the creation of a Bureau of Corporations, and for the appointment of a Commissioner of Corporations and his assistants, and then in the next clause grapples into Government control more affairs than have come under Government control in one act in a hundred years. Here is the exact language of the statute:

> The said Commissioner shall have power and authority to make, under the direction and control of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, diligent investigation into the organization, conduct and management of the business of any corporation, joint stock company or corporate combination engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations excepting common carriers subject to "An act to regulate commerce," approved February fourth, eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, and to gather such information and data as will enable the President of the United States to make recommendations to Congress for legislation for the regulation of such commerce, and to report such data to the President from time to time as he shall require; and the information so obtained, or as much thereof as the President may direct, shall be made public.

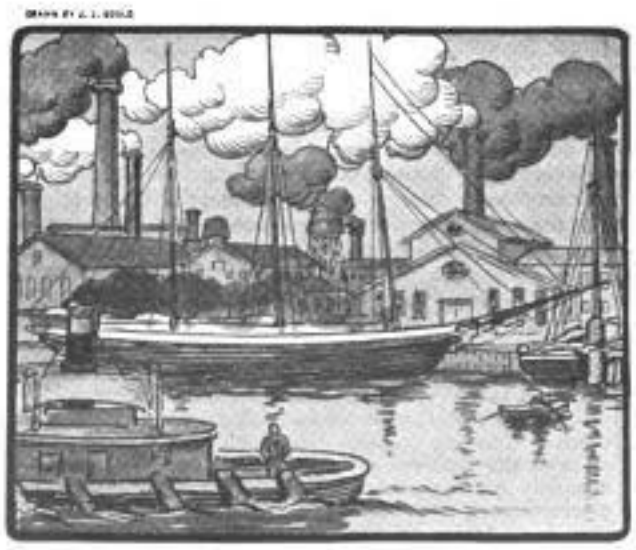
The power of the Commissioner of Corporations is made exactly the same as that of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and his power to "collect, publish and supply" information is made to apply specifically to insurance companies. Of these judicial powers, which concern the taking of testimony and the enforcement of mandates, it will be well to speak later, but before passing to that part of the subject this clause of the section must be considered: "And the information so obtained, or so much of it as the President may direct, shall be made public." This is the meat and meaning of the whole act. Publicity is to be the cure for fraudulent transactions in business. The law is going to recognize corporate cunning, which evades the written statute and frankly breaks the moral law. Ever since statutes were written they have assumed that a buyer who bought in ignorance had no restitution for his folly; it was his place to see that he was not swindled. The Government now changes this assumption. The widespread abuse of the sellers' privilege that has come about in the organization of corporations during the fifty years last past, the creation of fictitious values, the deception of stock manipulators, and the chicanery of stock-brigands, who wander up and down the markets marauding honest enterprises and looting as they go—all these things the Government has taken legal cognizance of, and therefore has said in effect that the casual investor must be protected in his investments. The protection the Government will afford is publicity. Take an investor in the Steel Corporation bonds. It is impossible for an average man, or an average dealer in stocks and bonds to know much about the actual conditions of some of the great corporations. Probably the very men who are floating them know little really about them in a real sense—that is to say, know their actual economic value as a trained economist should know it. This real knowledge should be the only basis for investment, and as the officers of the trust will not, because they cannot, probably, furnish this information to prospective investors, the Government believes it has a duty in the matter.

The Growing Power of Commissioners

WHEN the Government gets through examining a corporation, and when the true facts about it are known, the real earning value of a corporation's stock will be known, and it will be impossible to make fortunes dishonestly by manipulating that corporation's stock, and the ladies and gentlemen, sitting in the restaurant eating the proceeds of any stock that the Government has investigated and has found sound, will be eating bread honestly made. Society, which for the last fifty years has been taking charity out of private hands, and establishing great city hospitals and state asylums, and county eleemosynary institutions, seems about to reach into the realm of business and hold out a protecting hand to those who are the prey of corporate vultures. As human kindness becomes more and more universal it becomes a public sentiment, and that sentiment becomes a benevolent law. The publicity clause in the law creating the Department of Labor and Commerce is more than a reënactment of the Mosaic prohibition against stealing; it is a legal expression of the golden rule. For publicity is only a warning signboard, put up by the strong for the protection of the weak; it is merely doing unto others as you would have them do to you.

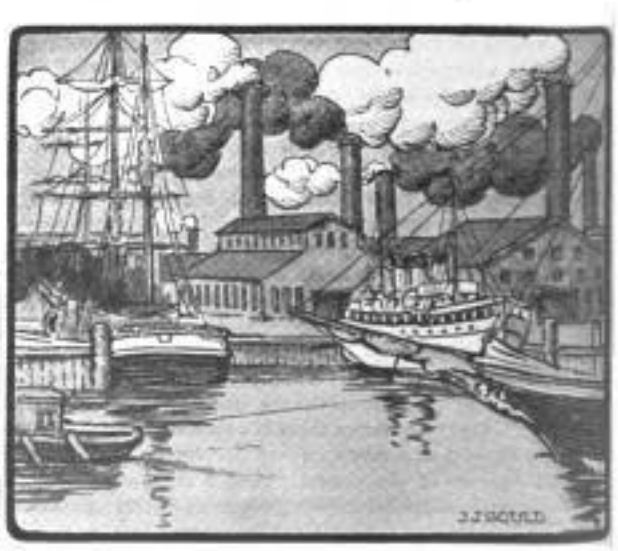
Another interesting phase of this new Department is found in the powers and privileges of the Commissioner of Corporations. It is important to note that he is called a Commissioner, for in the century last past commissioners have flourished, in America at least, because law does not presume intelligence in courts, and experience has proved that legislatures have precious little. Hence, commissioners—tax commissioners, insurance commissioners, canal commissioners, railroad commissioners, men who have special information that legislatures can't comprehend and that courts don't acquire; and the commissioners have legislative, executive and judicial powers. They can and do make rulings every day that are virtually legal enactments, and they are often courts of final appeal in interpreting their rulings, and have executive power to fine and imprison those citizens who disobey these mandates. And all this because the commission is supposed to have special intelligence and technical knowledge. There is no other possible reason for endowing it with such power.

So Congress made a Commissioner of Corporations and put him in control of every department of corporate business except the railroads. He can compel the humblest corporate brickyard to disclose its intimate affairs as readily as he can make the officers of the Standard Oil Corporation divulge their secrets. The Commissioner of Corporations can compel the concern which is afflicted with a labor strike to publish its condition, and show the public whether or not the profits of the concern warrant the demands of the strikers. He cannot compel arbitration, but he can give the public the real facts, and no strike can go on when the facts and equities of the case are known absolutely beyond a question. Public sentiment is a compulsory arbitration board from which there is no appeal, and when public sentiment is reliably informed it is a tremendous engine. No labor union and no industrial corporation can stand up against it. No other act created during this generation is so powerful to promote industrial peace as this act, creating the Department of Commerce, will be if it is wisely enforced.



And that brings us down to the men who will enforce this law. A law is only as efficient as the men who are empowered to enforce it, and no more so. Better a good man and a poor law than a poor man and a good law. The members of the Legion family who are in politics and dislike Theodore Roosevelt the man, and can find no comfort in him as President, were unspeakably offended at the appointment of George B. Cortelyou as Secretary of Commerce and Labor. These gentlemen said that the place called for a tried and experienced business man, and not a mere clerk! Others who admire the President and are of the type that goes through life looking for things to gasp at, were awe-stricken that a man who began life so humbly—as a stenographer, forsooth!—should become a member of the Cabinet. Which is more or less funny, since every member of the Cabinet, with one exception, had even a humbler beginning than that of stenographer.

The Real Marvel of Cortelyou's Rise



THE real marvel of Mr. Cortelyou's rise is not that he rose from stenographer to member of the Cabinet; a thousand men in this country have traveled farther in life than that; the wonder is that he rose step by step in Government work, with one promotion following another, until the appointment to a Cabinet portfolio was practically a civil-service promotion. There is no denying the fact that Mr. Cortelyou does not bring to the work before him a training as a business man; but, on the other hand, the mysteries of business training are hardly Sibylline; there is nothing so sacred and holy about a business training, except that it teaches industry, and if a man is reasonably honest it teaches him that honesty pays. As Secretary to three Presidents and as confidential friend of two, Mr. Cortelyou has been in the engine-room of some weighty matters: matters infinitely more weighty, for instance, than any deal or job or pool or combination that has been made on Wall Street for a generation. To rise as Mr. Cortelyou has risen he has had to work—twelve hours a day has been his average for many years—and his place was one where he took his business to bed with him and snuggled up to it as closely before falling asleep as any business man in America. The only thing Mr. Cortelyou lacked in going into his department is the moral sense of business. In this world traditions and customs make morals, and every trade and calling has its own set of morals, which on the whole are worthy. But often the professional morals of the clergy, for instance, which are no better than those of lawyers, puzzle the lawyers, and the morals of doctors, which are as good as the morals of preachers, puzzle the preachers, and the morals of politicians, which are as wholesome as those of lawyers or doctors, puzzle those in other callings, so that each profession is inclined to question the probity of the others: and the morals of the business world, which in these latter days of stock jobbing and complicated transactions have become a little biased and askew, have come to need some small revision. It is for this that the Department of Commerce and Labor was established, and it is because he is not infected with the moral impurities of a certain branch of business that Mr. Cortelyou is a particularly strong man for the place. He is a strong, practical man endowed with the world's every-day moral sense; but he has not the moral sense of "high finance," which sanctions a pool and regards the man in a pool, who unloads his stock on his confrères, as shrewd instead of dastardly. And with this moral sense Mr. Cortelyou has trained courage. He has been a buffer for a President for nearly ten years, and has learned to say no with remarkable ease, and to limit himself to a dozen yeses a day—which is enough for a Cabinet officer. Also—and this is important—Mr. Cortelyou is not a practical politician. A practical politician has no place in a Cabinet. McKinley knew this better than most Presidents. He had been down the line in politics, and he knew that if he wished to keep incompetent men and rascals out of office he must separate the promissory power of the campaign from the appointive power of the Administration. So he studiously offended the political bosses in his party by going into the bossed State and picking out the boss' dearest enemy and elevating him to the Cabinet. Thus he did with Root in New York and Smith of Pennsylvania, and by choosing unknown men from various States where the Senators were powerful. President Roosevelt seemed to recognize this axiom of administration in appointing Mr. Cortelyou. To have chosen a man even remotely connected by political obligation with the men who raise campaign funds or the men who have friends to "take care of," would have been suicidal to the new department.

Mr. Cortelyou's two chief assistants are James R. Garfield, Commissioner of Corporations, and George F. Clark, Assistant Secretary of the Department. Each of these men has special fitness for his work. Young Mr. Garfield has added to the training of a liberally educated and successful lawyer the invaluable experience of a short excursion into practical politics, and more than all has done good, though brief, service in the Civil Service Commission, a place that might well be called the Government rogues' gallery, for there sooner or later all the crooks of the service come to be catalogued and cleaned. Mr. Clark is a sociologist of another type; he has come down from the firm ground of practical life to this field in the theoretical. He has been a railroad conductor, which means that he has poked around in the switch-shanty enough not to believe all he hears; and later he managed a labor union and was promoted from that job to a place on the coal strike commission, and from there called to serve in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Thus the reader will see that the triumvirate that will have most to do with interpreting the law creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, and enforcing it, is made up of good average American citizens, from the middle way and walk of life. Their view of the law is likely to be the conservative view that the American always takes of his duty, when it is upon his own shoulders, and one cannot escape from the conclusion that the enforcement of the law is sure to make the most radical change in the attitude of this American Government to life. It virtually makes a new criminal code for new business conditions, making the corporation amenable and subject to punishment, as the individual has been since law was first written. The fact that the law was so quietly established, not to satisfy an angry people but to satisfy the ends of simple justice, will make it more thoroughly respected than otherwise, and hence easy to enforce. The earnestness of the present Administration to enforce such a law, and to correct those social and economic abuses that our civilization has fostered for a generation, may not be questioned.

The Babes in the Wood

HOW THE CAMPERS-OUT AT THE TARPEIAN ROCK MAINTAINED THE DIGNITY OF MAN

By Arthur E. McFarlane

JUST what happened that summer—though the four never ceased to protest with a shifty-eyed and flushing dignity that nothing whatever had happened—their feminine kin would give very much to find out. For when, after their three regular weeks in camp, men come home to pay laborious compliments to the cookery, to begin to show the most unwonted concern not to be irregular at meals, and to evince, in spasmodic bursts, the most uncanny appreciation of the ordering of the house in general, there is obviously something behind all that. If it is not absolutely suspicious, in common marital openness it calls for an explanation. What may possibly be the explanation is here to follow.

The party consisted of the "old four"—the Judge and Vanderdecken, Doctor Fergusson and the Colonel. For the second year they had elected to camp by the "Tarpeian Rock." And for a fortnight they had been trolling and whipping the sinuous length of Pickerel Lake, when Percy Johnston paddled the fifteen miles up to them from the clubhouse one morning. "That new crowd from Pittsburg wanted to be shown the Left Branch; could the Tarpeianers possibly spare them Ciprien for two or three days—four at the outside?"

"Spare Cip? Of course they could! Willingly! Delightedly! Enthusiastically! In fact, for several days now they had been thinking of presenting him with a purse to get him to go away!"

Cip—that shining-eyed young habitant—grinned appreciatively. But a few minutes later he had taken Percy Johnston aside, and was addressing him with great length and worriment of countenance. It puzzled the Judge, who came upon them unexpectedly; and when at last the guide went off to the supply tent to put his "robe" together he demanded the meaning of it.

Percy chuckled. "Mustn't tell you. It's a four-barreled insult."

"Wha-at?"

"Can't tell you."

"Here, come on!"

"Nope!"

"Son! Open up instanter!"

"Oh, well—if you insist upon it: Ciprien the Wise seems to be of the opinion that if you children are left to do your own work you'll all be bushwhacking one another with your shotguns before the first day is over!"

It tickled the four immensely. And they had the joke all over again by themselves between smudge and campfire that night. "It's a natural idea, too, very natural from Cip's point of view," said the Judge. "As he looks at it, it's only having meat and drink of proper quality and quantity, and at stated intervals, that keeps the whole mundane cosmos from reverting to primal chaos again. His honest soul feels the sway and attaches the same importance to the small, concrete, every-day things of the flesh which we attach to the expression of mind and spirit. To clearly differentiate is, I should say, one of the tests and touchstones of civilization."

"It is," said the Doctor. "It is! And frankly"—after a pause—"mustn't we confess that it's a touchstone which could almost be said to exclude women entirely? For, after all, do not our sisters still allow themselves to be given their greatest worries by the meat and drink and the small labors of the house—no less than Cip?"

"I'm afraid that's true," seconded the Colonel. "And we've got to acknowledge in our inmost hearts that a party of them could not dwell side by side as we do here, for a single day, without manifold chafings and internecine war. Yet year after year their husbands and brothers come back from weeks of rubbing together in woods and water with a friendship cemented more indivisibly than ever."

In Vanderdecken, with whom "anti-suffrage" was an only mania, this line of thought inspired even more feeling utterance. "And isn't it this power of men to live together in perfect harmony," he asked with almost religious solemnity—"isn't it this ever-renewed and impregnable respect for one another which perpetually reaffirms their essential superiority as a sex?"

It was full of these reflections—fundamental, basic, profound—that they finally retired to sapient slumber.

After their sunrise dip next morning they agreed to pair off and take the meals two and two, turn about. A toss of the penny gave the preparation of breakfast to Vanderdecken and the Colonel, and another toss made the latter cook.

"Vander" dragged half a dozen octopus-like cedar stumps up the shore to the little sheet-iron stove, and soon had firing enough piled up for a Highland beacon. And the Colonel led forth the battery of the kitchen. "I confess," he said, as he lit his fourth match, "that the primeval chemistry which constitutes cooking has always had a great fascination for me. I imagine that the rites of pot-and-kettle were the actual ceremonials which first began to draw the human race together."

The Colonel's own pot-and-kettle rites were serious, deliberate and protracted in the extreme. His cooking was of the consecutive rather than of the concurrent variety, and the others had been long beating upon their plates for it before finally it came.

And in spite of the time given to that first breakfast it was not wholly a success. The Doctor tasted the oatmeal somewhat as if he were trying a medicine. "Now, I'll tell you just what's the matter with this," he said confidentially; "it needs about twice as much salt and about half as much stirring."

"Ah—ah. Pretty painful dose, eh?"

"Oh, it might be a lot worse. A little poultice, perhaps—but this isn't one of my porridge mornings, anyway."

It did not seem to be a porridge morning for any of them.

The Colonel produced his coffee and bacon. He was a trifle red from the fire. "I'm afraid I didn't settle the coffee enough," he said.

"Very possibly not!" rejoined Vanderdecken jovially; "but you've certainly settled the bacon all right!" He crackled a slice tentatively between his teeth. "It'd just fill the bill as Saratoga chips, though."

"Vander's" sense of humor was in exceptionally good form that morning, and it came out particularly strong on the coffee. He was just reminding the cook that the original belief regarding the berry was that it kept men from ever sleeping again and drove animals crazy, when the Judge hastily broke in on him and began to talk fishing. Apparently the old gentleman had some absurd fear lest the Colonel mightn't be taking it right. And he hurried them off up the lake.

They had good sport that forenoon. What remained of Ciprien's minnows were not in the freshest possible condition. But the pickerel at the Narrows were waiting for them open-mouthed. Enough were taken to last the camp for the next three days. And the four also brought back ravening appetites.

Therefore the sight of the still dirty breakfast dishes gave them grievous pause. "I think for the general good," said the Doctor, "we'd better make it a rule henceforward to wash up immediately after the meal."

Vanderdecken and the Colonel carried the unclean pile of blue and white graniteware down behind the first clump of cedars to the big, flat 'longshore rock which was known as the "scullery." There was no hot water: and oatmeal which has been left long enough to glue and set, and fish fryings hardened to a skillet (as a certain George Hastings once had occasion to learn), are of all ill-favored substances the most detestably irremovable. When the pair returned from the "scullery" they walked in silence; and had they not also worked in silence, one might have thought that something had occurred between them.

But the pot was at least ready for the potatoes. And the Judge, chosen cook by the second toss-up, already had his pickerel split and floury for the pan. Both in the end came from the stove in a highly crumbled condition—"Scrambled Fish with Pommes de Terre à l'Explosion," Vanderdecken facetiously christened them. And the Doctor pointed out, as a pure matter of science, what a vast difference a little too much heat can make in a dish.

But both messes were rapidly tucked away, none the less; and afterward all four relaxed in a dessert of tobacco.

"I think I'll go and take my beauty sleep now," said the Judge at length. His ordeal was well over.

The others smoked another pipeful apiece.

"What's the program for this afternoon?" asked the Doctor finally.

"There's still some minnow bait left," said the Colonel, "and the Rapids bass ought to be biting. But you'll want to do the dishes first."

"Ye-es—yes, of course. Thank you for reminding me. Well, you two had better go ahead. We can follow you in the other boat."

It was all but six when the Judge at last awoke. In the level radiance of the setting sun the Doctor was sitting solitary on a stump, doing smithy work upon a lockjawed reel.

The old gentleman hurried out to him in a trepidation of humility. "Fergusson," he stammered, "I'm an unpardonable sinner. After sleeping like a log all afternoon, I've just opened my eyes to remember that I left you to wash those confounded dishes alone."

The Doctor flushed a little. "Oh—oh, that's all right. You see—I haven't done them yet."

They were still stooped over them deep in thought when the others pulled wearily in.

It was plain that they had no great string to show for their two hours at the oars and their afternoon of standing up thigh deep against the thrust and violence of the rapids. "Oh, Lord," groaned the Colonel, "I feel as if I'd been taking massage treatment under a log jam."

"And say," ejaculated Vanderdecken with pained and sudden recollection, "I guess it's up to us to get dinner, isn't it?"

"I'm afraid it is," said the Judge, "but if you'd like to change about——"

"No," vetoed the Colonel, who was the camp's man of system—"No, we can't start that! Once get our schedule tangled we'll never know where we're at." Moreover, it was "Vander's" turn to cook.

There went into his "primeval chemistry" little of that sprightly humor which had distinguished him during the meals of his fellows. And the dinner itself did not differ vastly from luncheon, except that it was considerably more uneatable. What was eaten was absorbed for the most part in a moody, uncommenting silence.

The Doctor alone lacked that final tact which should have kept him from turning the burnt side of his fish uppermost. But the spirit of scientific exposition was still strong in him. "Now, about the tea, too——" he said: "I'll tell you where both you and the Judge spoiled it. You put the time on its brewing that you should have put on steeping it. To do it correctly——"

"Oh, hang it, Doc, ring off," said Vanderdecken; "you've raised your full allowance of kicks to-day."

"'Kicks?' 'Raised kicks?' Why, really, now, my dear Ralph, really! I've passed one or two casual observations of the most general nature, and those only from my own professional knowledge——"

"Vander" sniffed.

"And in point of fact—but please don't imagine that I say it with any animus—it's seemed to me that the amount of amusement you have drawn from the cooking of the others——"

"Well, my aunt! If you're going to make penal business out of a few natural, well-intentioned jokes! For my part, I was under the impression that I was jollying matters up a little, and leaving things with a better taste in the mouth."

At this latter remark the Judge and Colonel turned and regarded him. He rose with much dignity and walked off.

"Look here," said the Doctor, appealing to the military member, "you weren't so foolish as to resent anything I said about your breakfast, surely?"

"Oh, no! No, not at all! And anyway, we have our chance to get back at you to-morrow morning."

"Yes—yes, exactly——" And then with a sudden contraction of the nostrils: "In the mean-time you'll want to wash up, won't you?"

Now that was low, and particularly so in so much as the Colonel's working partner had already "shunned the toil."

"You must let me help you," said the Judge, which should have filled the Doctor with apologizing shame. On the contrary, it seemed promptly to fill him very full of bile. Twice his mouth opened for speech; but finally he bit his lips together and started abruptly down toward the Point.

The two who remained washed the dishes side by side, and the Colonel's words were warm with appreciation beyond Anglo-Saxon usage. "After all," he said, "if a little roughing it brings out the seamy side of some people, it only shows you more plainly the real sort of stuff in others."

But it seemed to the Judge that if the Colonel's feelings were really what he protested them to be, it would have occurred to him that while he was talking he was letting his helper scrape out both the pot and the skillet. However, under the circumstances, he would not speak of it.

Camp broke up early that night. Incidentally, there had been no beds made. And Vanderdecken, who alone had thought to carry out his blankets to air in the morning, had unfortunately forgotten to carry them back again at sundown. When he did remember them they were already clammily misted with dew. He was still trying to dry them over the last of Ciprien's smudges long after the other three had gone brutally off to sleep.

II

BUT night brings good counsel and the dawn renewed sweetness of temper.

"Well, gentlemen," said the Colonel as he balanced himself beamingly on the "Tarpeian" for the morning plunge, "I reckon we must have had a visit from the hoodoo last night. If Cip had happened in on us we'd have had to do a lot of explaining; for nothing would have persuaded him that it wasn't having to do his work that was overwhelming us."

"That's right!" said the Doctor, who was in particularly high spirits. "Ha, ha, ha! And I confess that actually for a time I really believed we were going to have a falling out. I was a sinner myself, too, for which I want to ask pardon all round."

It was granted with effusion. And truly it was a mighty satisfaction to begin that second day with a slate wiped clean. As it happened, too, it was now the Doctor's turn to cook.

He was the first to dress. But the others rapidly joined him, and gathering about the "kitchen" followed his operations with that rapt interest which sometimes makes for nervousness. As for the Judge, he had done his part by starting his yoke-fellow with a fire of pine knots which in five minutes had the top of the stove looking like the four of hearts.

It also kept the Doctor doing three-handed legerdemain between the bacon, oatmeal and coffee. And the latter in the end managed to get one move ahead of him and boil over.

"But it's the better for going through that stage once," he explained, a little tight about the mouth. "Theory of wild oats, you know! And I intend further to improve it by adding the milk while it's still simmering."

This called for the opening of a new tin of "condensed," and the can-opener was just then in hiding. "Oh, that doesn't worry me at——" He got back to the stove just in time to catch the oatmeal assuming a lava formation. The trio of snickerings mounted to a hee-haw!

"It's a good joke to see the porridge burn," he said. "Ha, ha! A very good joke! As for that tin, I imagine the ax will open it."

He set the can on a stone, and triumphantly chopped a slit across its top, then turning it half-way round he struck again. One spurt of the lacteal mucilage went up his sleeve, the other into the neck of his sweater, over his Vandyck, and northward, dividingly, upon his face.

The Judge, who had a coarse, bucolic sense of humor at the best, looked once, then slid from his stump and collapsed on himself as if he had been punctured. The other two, however, got themselves to the Doctor's assistance. They mopped at his outlying geography, while he tried with smeary hands to wipe out his eye and mouth. And they attempted between spasms to make him see how funny it was.

His vision was clouded, however.

And just at this juncture, too, his coffee again felt its oats, and with joyous volatility began to swarm out over the side of its pent-house a second time. He caught at the pot to jerk it from the stove. It struck the handle of the bacon spider and tilted it fatally. He jumped to catch it, and being still optically on a bias, he put his foot into the saucer of buttery dripping. The dish broke into halves which closed about his shoe.

The Colonel had held out longest. Now, with the sound of a suddenly opened and very much clogged escape-valve, he took to grass beside the supply tent. The Judge, painfully gripping at his side, waved weakly at the Doctor to desist—as at a comedian who knows his power and is exercising it too pitilessly upon an already apoplectic audience.

As for the Doctor, he stood there for a moment, as it were, collecting himself. It might almost have been said that he smiled. Certainly his lips drew up as, turning, he again got sight of that can of "condensed." "Uh!" he grunted with a kind of satisfaction—and with his free foot sent it filliping far down the shore. The bacon pan lay sprawled face downward. It followed, though more soaringly. He swung round at the stove: "By gad, and you were in it, too!" And it went over like a turned turtle. Then he put down the coffee-pot with what stray sediment still remained in it, and took his way up the bank and off through the cedars. . . .

AND JUST AT THIS JUNCTURE, TOO, HIS COFFEE AGAIN FELT ITS OATS

He did not return for breakfast, and the others perforce made theirs principally of bread and butter. This brought them to a fitting realization that the Doctor's conduct had been something much more than funny. . . .

They were discussing it from its moral and ethical aspects—with the Judge palliatingly reminding them that the Doctor's after-shame and humiliation would punish him more than anything they could say, when the offender himself came down the shore again.

He gazed at them with challenging bellicosity. "I suppose you imagine that I'm going to wash up for you now?"

"Well—God—bless—me!" gasped the old gentleman, "and do you expect me to do it alone?"

"It's a matter of no concern to me whether you do or not. But in point of fact, you let me do most of it, including the frying-pan, last time."

At this the Judge could not speak at all.

"Oh, come now, Doctor," intervened the Colonel, "you must be mistaken about that."

The lancet-wielder stopped this flanking movement with a deadly stab. "Why, if you insist upon coming into it, Vanderdecken says that you do just the same with him."

"I? I do that? I let——?"

"Oh!—O Lord, now, Doc!" Vanderdecken went tomato-color. "Excuse me! I didn't say that. What I said, and that was in confidence and altogether in a joking way, was merely that——"

"Oh, well! Well! Well!" The Judge spread his fat hands in soothing desperation. "I'll do them alone this time. So that's settled, now; that's settled!"

"And I'll help you," said the Colonel; "but I must say that all this is simply playing hob with our schedule!"

"Vander" and the Doctor strode off in opposite directions—the former with his double-barrel and the latter with his pickerel rod. But it was plain that their real business was to seek the cooling power of Nature.

The Colonel looked after Vanderdecken rawly. "I can understand the Doctor's showing a little natural temper," he said to the Judge, in embittered confidence; "but to find that a man supposedly your friend has been talking about you behind your back—that's one thing I—— And if I did possibly let him do a little more than half his share of the dishes it was only because he'd let me do practically everything else. And, you remember, last night, didn't he slope the job altogether?"

The Judge puffed gloomily. "Yes; and what I can't get the logic of is, when a man has cooked the poorest possible apology for a meal or queered it completely, if we show our willingness to take it as a joke and go without eating till next time, why he should act as if he were the aggrieved party? And that applies to both of them, too! Bless my soul, we might as well be so many tea-soured old maids!"

They went into the situation with all possible charity. But nothing could sweeten it. No one would have dreamed that in one day both Vanderdecken and the Doctor would so put on the Mr. Hyde. One can only live and learn.

When the Doctor came back, however, he had evidently tramped at least a little of the venom out of him. He made no apologies; but with a subdued dangerousness of countenance he set up the stove again and proceeded to get luncheon by himself. And Vanderdecken also brought back the chip-on-the-shoulder expression of potential penitence. He, too, asked pardon of no man, but he volunteered to wash up alone. And the Colonel in his turn then showed the proper spirit of forgiveness by throwing off his coat and helping him.

The sight fairly restored his optimism to the Judge. And when the two later announced that they were going to pull down the lake together and have another go at the Rapids bass, his farewell to them had the tone of a benison. As for the Doctor, he reminded them that the camp was out of bread and butter, and asked them to stop off and get some at the "New Settlement" as they came back.

When the pair had left them they could not forbear discussing the matter together. To the old gentleman the craft of the camp at large had at last passed safely through the zone of storms, and henceforward it would sail unclouded seas.

"I tell you what, though," said the Doctor, "a little more and it would have been a case of fisticuffs."

"Oh, no! Oh-h, I can't subscribe to that, no, not for a minute! It's possible for the civilized man of middle age to let himself go far, painfully far. But as to coming actually to blows—no, there is something in the innate dignity of man—there's a feeling about that—well, it's the one bulwark we maintain against the barbarous, and—I've taken note of it repeatedly—it's a bulwark almost infinitely hard to break down."

They went off for a couple of hours' trolling, and the Judge got a "cyclone" strike, only to lose both fish and spoon. But for all that he came back to camp with a countenance as tranquilly roseate as the sunset.

III

IT WAS dusk when the Colonel and Vanderdecken returned.

And again—Heaven help Tarpeian Camp!—it was abundantly evident that once more all was not well between them!

"Well, what's up now?" asked the Doctor, resignedly laying down his tackle box.

"Nothing," said Vanderdecken.

"Except that I felt compelled to decline assuming Ciprien's work," added the Colonel.

"I tell you, my dear Harrison, that nobody wanted or expected you to!"

"You seemed to expect me to spend my entire afternoon catching minnows for you! But let's say no more about it, now!"

"I seemed to expect you to keep to your agreement. After spending about an hour grabbing for crabs on the Shoal, I had an idea that you'd hold by your own arrangement and see to providing the fish bait."

"Yes, I would!—when the bass wouldn't take anything but minnows, and you were feeding them out faster than I could net them! That's what I call easy fishing! That's what——"

"That's what I——"

"Oh, now, let it go! Let it go!" The Judge shook his head in utter woefulness again. "Just say no more about it, and bring up the bread and butter."

"'Bread and butter'?"

"I suppose you were too busy to remember a mere trifle like that?" suggested the Doctor. He was very hungry, and he had been looking forward to that double staff of life. But he was not given to making complaints, and told them so.

"Oh, well," snarled the Colonel at last, "I suppose you can get dinner for once without it?"

"Why, we don't get dinner!"

"You don't? I'd like to know who does, then?"

"Well, as far as I'm concerned, I would simply remind you that I got luncheon."

"Yes, you did," came back the man of schedules, "but you got it out of your turn, and now you've succeeded in getting things so completely balled up——"

"Well, by the living Christmas! And when I did that purely with the idea of smoothing matters out all 'round!"

The Judge could listen to no more. "My! My! My! 'Tea-soured old maids?' One would think you were a lot of little girls! I can't stand this ding-danging much longer! I'll get dinner!"

"And for the matter of that, you might very well, too. You haven't done the first tap all day!"

The old gentleman sat down as if he had been knocked! "Haven't done anything? Haven't done anything? When I've practically been over the stove or washing dishes ever since Ciprien left! I'm the only one in this camp who has done anything! And I'm getting so dratted sick of the whole dratted business——!" He began blindly to grope about for his glasses. "You'd think the very fiend was in it."

"Well," said the Colonel, "if you'd chosen to listen to me when I warned you to stick to a definite system——"

"'System? System?' Bah! It's playing slinker when there's work to be done——"

"'Slinker?' Do you call me——"

* * * * * * * * * *

The asterisks do not stand for speeches of love. And when the four finally ceased afflicting one another and went to bed, it was to be themselves afflicted. For since none of them had been willing to prepare more smudge—the last of Ciprien's being now exhausted—mosquitoes in millions came up against them; and they came with swords and spears. Hour after hour did the quartet lie awake and fight them—and in the intervals they fought among themselves. It was all but dawn when at last commiserating slumber descended and bore them to a happier land.

They went out next morning to be forthwith reminded that the dishes were still unwashed.

"Well," said the Colonel amiably, at the end of some five minutes, "we can either start making fools of ourselves again, or we can lay out another schedule, and this time stick to it!"

There was no response.

"Oh, well, then—I'll get breakfast, and we'll draw lots for who will do the first dishwashing. Will that satisfy you?"

They drew lots—and the Colonel got the dishwashing also!

There is this about a genuine feeling for the funny: it may seem, by most untoward circumstances, to have been completely crushed and obliterated, when, like the blessed camomile, "which the more it is trodden on the faster it grows," it will suddenly burst forth again with a vigor only strengthened and renewed. And now the other three once more gave proof of theirs—hiccoughing, holding to the table and guy ropes and rolling about like buoys!

The Colonel stood with the coffee-pot in his hand and looked at them. And the more he looked at them the more they were affected. But when the Doctor went off for the fourth time, and the Judge had passed into a kind of wheeze, he set down the pot. "All right!" he said; "all right! Since you think wise to take it that way, I don't do either!"

And at that douche they came to themselves only too quickly. "Oh, heavens and earth!" choked Vanderdecken, "now it's all off again!"

Really, it was too much. In a speechless acrimony they walked up shore to the cedars, and mechanically began to throw off their night togs for the morning dip.

The Judge and "Vander" were down on the beach. The Doctor was on the top of the bank, a dozen yards above them. He looked back toward the approaching Colonel. "Well, great Scott!" he said, "I must say it didn't take much to make him swallow himself."

The other two stared up at him savagely. "Why, it was your fool noise that did it!" said Vanderdecken.

"It was!" affirmed the Judge; "it was! Really, I don't see why you need have cackled quite so much!"

"Well—my—Lord! Huh! Huh!! And simply because I happen to have a little better sense of humor than you have!"

"Oh, throw me down the soap," sputtered the old gentleman, quite beside himself.

The Doctor picked up the cake of soggy castile, threw it without looking, and it struck the Judge squarely on the back of the neck.

There was no intention whatever in it. But to the Judge's limitless discredit let it be written down that without one moment's hesitation he took it as intentional. He stood gasping while he regained his balance; then with the "h-hrumph-ph!" of an elephant gone musth, he began to make ferociously up the bank.

Vanderdecken saw it, and the Colonel, too, almost in the same instant. The Doctor was just in the act of removing an upper garment, and his arms were "held up" helplessly above his head; it was through the bosom-slit of that upper garment that he was suddenly given paralyzing vision of the charging escalader. He attempted to take a step forward. But a small log lay stretched just in front of him, and he pitched headlong over it on face and elbows. His posture was that of a devotee in a mosque; but his language was inexpressibly out of keeping.

The Judge had all but rushed him, with Vanderdecken close behind, when the Colonel burst in between them. Panting with indignation he thrust the latter back. "Good Lord—Good Lord—wouldn't it be sufficiently bad without you piling on to help?"

"'Piling on?' 'Piling on?' Say! Say! I might pile on all right, but"—he boiled over with wrath and disgust—"unless you think I've gone batty altogether, I wish you'd just tell me anybody in this camp that I'd want to help!"

Between them, however, they averted hostilities for the immediate moment. Yet, though no blow had been struck, the four Tarpeianers had experienced their crowning and final shame. And within the hour Ciprien's canoe pushed into the bay!

It had not that complexion then, but there need be no further proof of the unsleeping watchfulness of a benevolent Providence. Cip was quite blind to their condition—he saw no more than the bird of wisdom does by day; all he did was to cook them a combination breakfast and luncheon which would have drawn the four points of the compass together. Then he netted enough minnows for forty, and sent his charges off to fish. And by next morning one might have said that all was as it had been before! But there were things which no one felt could be alluded to for many months to come.

Yet perforce they were alluded to, and that one afternoon of the following week, when their guardian had gone for bread. The Doctor had rashly remarked upon the "weight of Cip's household worries."

"He's little better than a woman," said Vanderdecken with cruel reminiscence. All alike tried to direct their eyes so that no two of them should meet.

"In all confidence, Van, in all confidence," murmured the Judge, shaking his head with mortified abasement. There was a silence.

It was the Colonel who broke it, and he broke it with a sudden burst of humble confession. "Gentlemen—Heaven pardon the selfishness of it, and keep the women from hearing me—but, after the light of—last week—I've been sending up my fervent thanks morning, noon and night for having been born a man!"

"And I! And I!" said the Judge. "But indeed I've felt that we owe it as a penance—to say nothing of its possibly being some alleviation of their lot—to own frankly to—Monday and Tuesday last, when we return to our respective helpmeets again."

"No!" said the Doctor hastily. "No! I had entertained some such thought as that, myself. But, believe me, it would not be judicious. It's a case where silence is the best wisdom—it is really!"

"Yes," rejoined "Vander." "I suppose the—the dignity of man—demands it."

And they never spoke of that matter again.

OUR AMERICAN SNOBS

By James L. Ford

THE WOMAN ON THE MAKE

LONG ago Mrs. Taffeta discovered that Mrs. Foxglove was on friendly terms with Mrs. Fenwick Bertram, or "Mrs. Fen," as we term her in the careless intimacy engendered by our society table-talk. How Mrs. Taffeta made this discovery I do not know, for the little Southern widow is too well bred to boast of her swell friends, but it is certain that the fact was known to her, and through her to the rest of us, for many months before the fateful afternoon when a handsome victoria drew up before our door and a liveried footman rang the bell with a sudden peal that set Mrs. Grinders scurrying from her third floor front to the parlor, where, from behind the curtains, she gaped at "Mrs. Fen" and took in with her eye every detail of her dress and equipage. She was still at her post and literally bubbling over with information when I entered the room after having met "Mrs. Fen's" carriage, with its owner and Mrs. Foxglove ensconced on the back seat, rolling swiftly toward Fifth Avenue.

"What do you think of that?" demanded Mrs. Grinders excitedly, as I walked over to the mantelpiece to see if anything had come for me in the early afternoon mail. "Mrs. Bertram's just come and taken your friend Mrs. Foxglove out driving. My, but she did look grand, sitting there behind them two men in livery and with furs on her back that must have cost a thousand dollars if they cost a cent. I felt sorry for Mrs. Foxglove, poor little woman, with her cloth jacket on, sitting up against so much style. I'd have offered to lend her my seal plush sacque only she's a touchy little thing and you never know how she's going to take a kindness. The queerest part of it was that she didn't seem to want to go, because I saw her shake her head at first and look at her watch, as much as to say that she'd got some other engagement—like as not with that tall party that comes to see her Sunday afternoons, for she gave Bridget a letter for somebody that was to call. Anyway, it must have taken Mrs. Bertram five minutes to persuade her to go with her, and then she kept her waiting so long that I could see she was getting fearful cross and impatient sitting out there all alone in her carriage and stared at by everybody on the block. She's a sly little thing, never tells her business to any one. Like as not she's going calling now on some gilt-edged house on Fifth Avenue."

And having thus freed her mind Mrs. Grinders went down into the basement to cross-examine Bridget in regard to the message Mrs. Foxglove had intrusted to her.

While I was still busy with my letters the tall Southerner entered the room and saluted me with the grave courtesy that is characteristic of his kind. He held in his hand a letter that Bridget had just given him and, after having shaken my hand and inquired about my health, he seated himself by the window, adjusted his eyeglasses and, with a word of apology, opened and read the letter that Mrs. Foxglove had left for him, while I turned again to my own correspondence.

"I wish you a very good-afternoon, sir," he said as he rose from his chair, and there was a change in his voice that I noticed at once. Something had evidently vexed him, for he walked up the street with an angry stride and with Mrs. Foxglove's note doubled up in his clenched fist.

Editor's Note—This is the fourth of Mr. Ford's papers. The next will appear in an early number.

A MOIST AND DISCONSOLATE FIGURE

Digitized by Google

Late in the afternoon a brisk spring shower came up, and while I was lounging at the parlor window waiting for it to clear off I was amazed to see Mrs. Foxglove come running down the street, without an umbrella and with her skirts clutched in both hands. I opened the hall door for her and she came in breathless and dripping with rain. To my untutored eyes her new bonnet seemed a complete ruin and her delicate silk petticoat bedraggled beyond all hope of restoration. Knowing something of her poverty, a feeling of profound pity filled my soul. "That gentleman was here, ma'am, just after you went out," said Bridget, putting her head in at the door. "I give him your letter, ma'am, as you asked me."

"And did he leave an answer with you?" she inquired eagerly.

"No, ma'am, not with me."

As Bridget retired Mrs. Foxglove went to the mantelpiece and looked through the pile of letters.

"If you were speaking of Mr. Buchanan, I'm quite sure that he did not leave any letter," I remarked.

"You saw him then?" she said, and then added, "perhaps he left it with one of the other servants?"

"No," I answered, "he came in here with a letter in his hand and went away the moment he read it. In fact, he went out in something of a hurry and stalked up the street at a rather swifter gait than I ever saw him strike before. But how did you come to be out in all this storm? Why, you're wet through! You should go and change your things."

I said this with an air of great solicitude, as if I were deeply concerned for Mrs. Foxglove's health, but the truth of the matter was that her lip was trembling, her blue eyes were swimming, and I was afraid she would break down altogether and I should have a crying woman on my hands. It was too late, though. I turned a discreet back but I could hear her half-stifled sobs, and when I looked again she was sitting in the window-seat, her face buried in her hand, a moist and disconsolate figure that moved even my heart to compassion. My first thought was to escape noiselessly, but I paused with my hand actually on the doorknob and came back, for I was afraid that some of the household vultures would find her crying her heart out by herself and worm from her the story of her grief—a delicate office which I felt competent to assume myself.

"My dear Mrs. Foxglove," I said confusedly, "I hope nothing serious has happened. Very likely Mr. Buchanan will write you this evening. Of course he couldn't answer your letter here because there was nothing to write with. Aren't you afraid your bonnet will be ruined if you don't take it off and smooth it out with a hot iron or hang it up to dry or something? Your dress is soaking, too."

"I don't care," wailed the poor little woman; "very likely it is ruined, but I've found out one thing and that is that all you men are just alike."

"It is a fortunate thing," I remaked, "that you have made this extraordinary discovery in regard to my sex while you are still young enough to put it to some practical use. I should think, however, that your whole soul would be illumined by the joy of this knowledge, which will greatly simplify any dealings that you may have with any of us in the future. For my own part I am glad that no two women on the earth's surface resemble one another in the slightest degree, for if they were all alike this would be a dull world indeed. But I thought you went out driving to-day; how is it that you return on foot?"

"I did go out driving," she said wiping her eyes, for by this time her storm of grief had spent itself. "A friend of mine was kind enough to come here and invite me out for a little airing, and I thought that as she'd taken all that trouble it would be very rude of me not to go, even if I did expect callers. Yes, I suppose my hat is ruined, but that isn't the only thing that's been spoiled to-day."

She began to sniff again but I diverted her attention by saying suddenly: "You haven't told me how you came to be out on foot in all that rain?"

"Well," she said, after a moment's hesitation, "the fact is that after we got through our drive Mrs. Bertram suddenly remembered that she had an engagement on Fifth Avenue, away uptown, and she asked me if I'd mind going home by myself. Of course she said that if I didn't care to she'd be glad to drive me back and try to make her call some other day, but I wouldn't hear of such a thing, especially after she'd been so kind as to come here and take me out, so I insisted upon going home alone. I'd forgotten to bring my purse and of course I didn't have any umbrella, and before I could get here it began to rain, and that's how I got my hat ruined and my skirts wet."

"And that's the reason you've been crying your eyes out."

"No, I wasn't crying about that," she said hastily. "In fact, I wasn't crying about any one thing in particular, but everything's gone wrong with me this afternoon and that was the last straw. Didn't he say anything when he read my letter? Or did he just get up and walk out of the room?"

"If you'll permit me," I said gravely, "I will show you exactly what he did," and I forthwith enacted the entire scene of Mr. Buchanan's entrance, his salutation to me, his reading of the letter and his dignified exit. I even offered to put on my hat and coat and stride away up the street after the manner of the tall Southerner, but Mrs. Foxglove declared that my portraiture was already a convincing one and had revealed to her more than could be told in words.

"And now may I ask you another question?" I continued, for I had determined to "improve the occasion," as the evangelists say, with a brief homily on certain phases of human weakness and vanity. "Will you tell me where you went for your airing?"

"Oh, we had a nice drive up Fifth Avenue," she began weakly, "and then Mrs. Bertram remembered that she had an errand to do, so we stopped at the dressmaker's, and when we got there her dress was ready to try on, and that kept us quite a while. She likes to have me help her with her dresses and she's awfully nice about it, too, and tells everybody that I've got so much taste. Well, it was quite late when we got through, and then just as we were coming out she remembered that she had to go uptown, and so I said good-by and started to walk home, for I'd left my purse behind and I was ashamed to ask her for a nickel for fear she'd despise me. I had to come just twenty-two blocks, a little more than a mile, and the shower came up and caught me before I knew it."

"So this drive was only a little more than a mile and you had to walk back?"

"We didn't go very far to-day because Mrs. Bertram was afraid we'd get caught in the rain and——"

"Yes, she was so afraid of the rain that she let you walk home. May I ask what scheme of entertainment she devised for you at the dressmaker's?"

"It wasn't any entertainment at all. She had her dress tried on and I went into the fitting-room just to see if the back of the waist was all right. It was lucky I did, for I found that that wretched Madame Cavanaugh was putting lace that wasn't worth more than five cents a yard on a dress she was charging her one hundred and seventy-five dollars for, and the plaits in the back of the waist were all in crooked. I told Mrs. Bertram about it and she made her do the whole thing over again, and I promised to go with her the next time she goes to have it tried on. But didn't that Madame Cavanaugh look daggers at me, though! You may not think me very bright, but when it comes to gowns and bonnets it's pretty hard to fool me."

"I hope Mr. Buchanan knows how advantageously you were employed this afternoon; it might compensate him for the annoyance that he evidently felt when he found you were not here. He is a very old friend of yours, is he not?"

"Yes," replied Mrs. Foxglove wistfully; "that is to say, he was. I suppose he's awfully mad, but I can't help it. Oh, you men are all alike; you can't understand a mother's feelings or make any allowance for the sacrifices we have to make for our children. Here's London Buchanan who's known me since long before I was married, and yet he goes off mad just because I was obliged to break an appointment with him and go out driving with Mrs. Bertram instead of going to a matinée with him. Well, if he's willing to break a friendship that's lasted for years just because I had to do my duty to my daughter I sha'n't complain, but at any rate it's taught me something about men that I didn't know before, and you're all alike—every one of you."

How long Mrs. Foxglove would have continued this superb demonstration of the feminine capacity for a logical and consistent arraignment, backed by a mass of unanswerable evidence against the sex which can be termed strong only because the other is believed to be weak, I do not pretend to say. I know that I saw signs of another storm gathering in the tear belt and I interrupted her with a stern request for silence and attention.

"My dear Mrs. Foxglove," I said, "do you realize what you have done this afternoon? Do you comprehend the extent of the misfortune toward which your ridiculous folly, your absurd worship of the brazen calf is inevitably leading you? Above all, do you know what Mrs. Bertram is?"

"No," said Mrs. Foxglove, a little frightened at my intensity. "I'm sure she's a perfectly good woman. Why, she's received everywhere——"

"Which is, of course, a convincing proof of her goodness," I interposed, and then added solemnly and with uplifted finger, "but Mrs. Bertram is something more than a good woman—she is On the Make. Do you mean to tell me that you haven't found that out yet?"

"I haven't noticed it—that is to say, I don't know what you mean."

"I'll tell you what I mean. She comes here with her carriage, under pretense of taking you out to drive, to cheat a poor, little, simple, hard-working woman like yourself out of her time, her business connection, her friends and her professional taste and knowledge, and then allows her to go home on foot in a storm that ruins her new bonnet. Now, my dear Mrs. Foxglove, will you do me a great favor and tell me why in the name of Heaven you keep talking about a mother's duties to her offspring whenever I warn you against such utterly worthless people as Mrs. Fenwick Bertram?"

"Because I do it all for the sake of my child. I know perfectly well that it's convenient for these women to have me go with them to the dressmakers' shops and put them on to some of the wrinkles that I've learned myself through my business. But I'm not doing this for myself. I'm doing it because I want Alice to know some desirable people when she grows up."

"In the name of Heaven!" I exclaimed angrily, "will nothing open your eyes to your own foolishness? Do you imagine that a cold-blooded, selfish, pushing woman like this Bertram creature could advance your daughter socially, even if she would? Do you know that of all human beings in this world there is no one who can approach in meanness, cruelty, heartless indifference to the rights and feelings of others and absolute general worthlessness the woman who is On the Make? Do you know that in the matter of benevolence the cuttlefish is a veritable Peter Cooper in comparison with her, and that a hyena leaves more on the bones of his victims, because the brute at least will not rob them of their sympathies as she will when she finds that they have neither purse nor scrip? In London you may see an entire Anglo-American colony made up of these women, and it resembles a basket of crabs more than anything else that I can think of. Each one of its members is clutching its immediate neighbors with its claws and with not a thing to feed on in the whole lot. Try to lift one of them up and a dozen will come along with it, and every one of them keenly On the Make. The early settlers of this country began the education of their children by teaching them to beware of rattlesnakes and bears, and it behooves you to——"

"A letter for you, Mrs. Foxglove, and the boy says there's an answer," said Bridget, suddenly entering the room.

I watched the little widow as she opened the note, and I can think of nothing but the old worn-out metaphor of the sun breaking through a mass of April clouds that can compare in any way with the smile that lit up her woebegone little face as she read her letter. I am sure now that Mrs. Foxglove can smile like that when she is alone, and there are very few women that I believe in to that extent.

MEN AND WOMEN

"A PLEASANT YOUNG CHAP"

The Admiral's Wish

THE recent interview of Admiral Dewey in which he said the American Navy had nothing to fear from Germany, and the pother kicked up by Germany about it, reminded the Admiral's friends of a similar interview he gave out on his way home from Manila to the triumphal reception in New York.

Somewhere on the cruise there came aboard the Olympia a newspaper correspondent with a letter of introduction to the Admiral from a common friend. The Admiral talked freely. The correspondent printed what he said. One sentiment was that, sooner or later, this country is to have a war with Germany.

After the interview was printed the Admiral stood by what he had said. As he is a sailor man and not a politician he did not try to impeach the reporter. Still, he thought there might possibly be an inquiry about the interview, either from this country or Germany, and he decided to prepare a statement, for he knew he should be very busy when he reached New York.

The Admiral thought about the statement for some days. Then he concluded what he wanted to say was this: "Yes, I said what the reporter quoted me as saying, and I hope I shall be alive when it happens."

Pauncefote's Pleasant Young Friend

SIR MICHAEL HERBERT, the new British Ambassador, does not believe in talking to the newspapers. He gives no interviews. In this respect he follows the precedent set by Sir Julian Pauncefote, whom he succeeded. Several of the Ambassadors at Washington give out authorized interviews on occasions, carefully revising the text after the chosen reporter has made a "story" of what they said.

A discussion of this rule of the British Embassy at a dinner party in Washington a night or two ago brought out the story of the only Pauncefote interview on record. One morning the Capital was surprised to find the British Ambassador quoted extensively in a New York newspaper. Sir Julian was as much astonished as anybody. Two colleagues found him at the Embassy reading and re-reading the interview.

"Most extraordinary!" said Sir Julian, "most extraordinary!"

"Did you say it?" asked one of the visitors.

"Why, yes," replied Sir Julian, "it represents my views correctly, but I talked to no one save a pleasant young chap who sat next to me on a tram car yesterday afternoon."

"He probably was a reporter," was suggested.

"Most 'extraordinary!" commented Sir Julian again. "Why, he had no notebook that I saw and he reproduces what I said most accurately. My word, but these American journalists are most remarkable, most remarkable."

After that Sir Julian never talked to "pleasant young chaps" on the tram cars.

Presidential Emphasis

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT is the incarnation of emphasis, both physically and mentally, but he never goes beyond the bounds of propriety to add to the force of his language, although he often overleaps the conventions.

His favorite word of commendation is "bully." He uses it constantly. Not long ago, in referring to the wise and venerable Senator Platt, of Connecticut, he said, admiringly: "Now, isn't Platt a bully old boy?"

The President does not swear. Sometimes he says "By George!" and at rare intervals, when the situation is extremely grave, he exclaims, "By Jove!"

A Memorable Day

SOME time after the Battle of Manila Admiral Dewey was entertaining some visitors on board the Olympia. The flagship was at her prettiest. The brass work was brilliant and everything neat and shipshape.

One of the visitors, a gushing young woman from the United States, went into raptures.

"Oh, Admiral Dewey," she said, "what a beautiful ship!"

"Yes," assented the Admiral.

"OH, ADMIRAL," SHE SAID

"Charming," continued the young woman, "so wonderfully clean; and, Admiral, tell me, when did you bring the Olympia to Manila?"

"On May 1, last, Madam," replied the Admiral without raising an eyebrow.

Where Postmaster Payne Got His Gout

SENATOR MARK HANNA has a lame knee. The ailment has been described many times as the gout. It is nothing of the sort. The trouble is due to a fibrous growth that makes it extremely painful for the Senator to walk at times, and is always inconvenient.

A few days ago Postmaster-General Payne limped through the lobby of the Arlington Hotel in Washington. Senator Hanna was sitting in one of the big leather chairs.

"What's the matter with Payne?" asked a friend.

"He's got the gout—real, old-fashioned gout," Senator Hanna replied. "He came here from his rural retreat in Wisconsin and ate too much terrapin."

Senator Hanna paused. Then, with fine indignation, he said: "I don't know that I'm sorry for him. Why, when his friends began twitting him about having the gout he calmly told them he caught it from me."

A Daniel Come to Judgment

JOSEPH L. BRISTOW, Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, and Senator Burton were political enemies out in Kansas, and are yet.

As soon as Mr. Burton was elected to the Senate he went to Washington to ask the President for Bristow's scalp.

"I am glad to see you, Senator Burton," said President McKinley, "glad to see you. It is a good thing to have strong young men in the Senate. I shall be glad to do anything I can for you."

KNEW WHAT WAS COMING

"That, Mr. President," said Senator Burton, "brings me to the point I want to make. I desire to speak to you concerning the Federal patronage."

President McKinley knew what was coming. He had been warned. "Certainly, Senator," he replied suavely, "certainly; whenever you have any good man you want placed, any good man—like Bristow, for instance—come and see me. Good-morning."

Bristow is in the Department yet and just now strong in the public view from the investigation he is conducting.

The Right Place to Begin

WHEN the political history of Maryland is written there will be a paragraph or two for the McComas-Mudd feud. It is now in progress, bitter and unrelenting. McComas was a United States Senator until March 4 last and Mudd is a Representative in Congress. Both are Republicans.

In the old days, though, they were bosom friends. McComas was the leader and Mudd a follower. One day they were dining together.

"Sydney," asked McComas, "how old is your boy?"

"Sixteen," replied Mudd proudly.

"My, my," said McComas, "I didn't think he was so old, but, I tell you, Sydney, when the time comes I'll do something handsome for that boy."

Mudd leaned over the table. "Mac," he said, "when you want to do anything for the Mudd family you forget the boy and begin with the old man."

Curtis' Permanent Investment

WILLIAM E. CURTIS, the newspaper correspondent and author, was an old friend of Eugene Field. They worked for the same Chicago paper. A few years before Field died he and Curtis were in St. Louis together and at the same hotel. About eleven o'clock one night, just as Curtis was getting ready for bed, Field came to his room and said: "Will, let me take fifty dollars. I have a party of friends downstairs and I sha'n't have enough money to pay my share of the bill unless you do."

Curtis gave Field the fifty dollars. Field did not mention the loan while they remained in St. Louis and went back to Chicago without paying it.

About a year afterward Curtis went to Chicago. Field had not paid back the money. While he was in his newspaper office Curtis went into Field's room. Field was effusively glad to see him.

"BEGIN WITH THE OLD MAN"

They talked of various things. Finally Curtis nerved himself to speak of the fifty dollars.

"My dear old chap," cried Field, "it had entirely slipped my mind. I hadn't thought of it since. Of course I remember it. I'll let you know about it to-morrow."

He did. Next day when Curtis was reading Field's column, "Sharps and Flats," he came across this paragraph:

"Mr. William E. Curtis, the distinguished Washington correspondent and literary man, is in Chicago looking after some of his permanent investments."

Senator Platt's Heroes of Fiction

BOYS who aspire to be detectives, Indian fighters, cowboys and road agents are not the only persons who buy and read the blood-and-thunder literature so profusely displayed on the news-stands.

Many staid and earnest citizens find mental relaxation in reading about the doings of Deadwood Dick and Old Nick Carter.

A few days before Congress adjourned Senator Platt, of Connecticut, met Representative Metcalfe, of California, in one of the corridors of the Capitol.

"Metcalfe," he asked, "do you read books?"

"Yes," Metcalfe replied, "some books."

"What kind of books do you read?"

"Well, to tell the truth," said Metcalfe apologetically, "I prefer detective stories to anything else."

"Old Sleuth?" asked Senator Platt.

"Yes."

"With a villain in 'em?"

"Yes."

Senator Platt chuckled. "So do I," he said, and then he stalked solemnly away.

According to the Directions

EVERY time a man without governmental experience goes into the Cabinet he is amazed to find he is expected to sign hundreds of letters about which he knows nothing. Usually, a new Secretary starts out bravely to read the letters that come to his desk, but this does not last long. In the Government service the men who do the letter signing turn the routine letter writing over to various subordinates and require the initials of those subordinates on the letters as a guarantee that they are all right.

When Secretary Shaw went into the Cabinet he had the usual experience. He found that twice a day a negro messenger brought in bales of typewritten letters, placed them before him, and stood ready to blot and remove them deftly after he had signed. On the second day the messenger came with his cargo of letters. The first one was a long, technical reply to an appraiser who had submitted a complicated customs problem, written by the Department expert. The Secretary read the letter carefully. It was Greek to him. He puzzled over it a minute and then said: "What's all this about? I am sure I don't know."

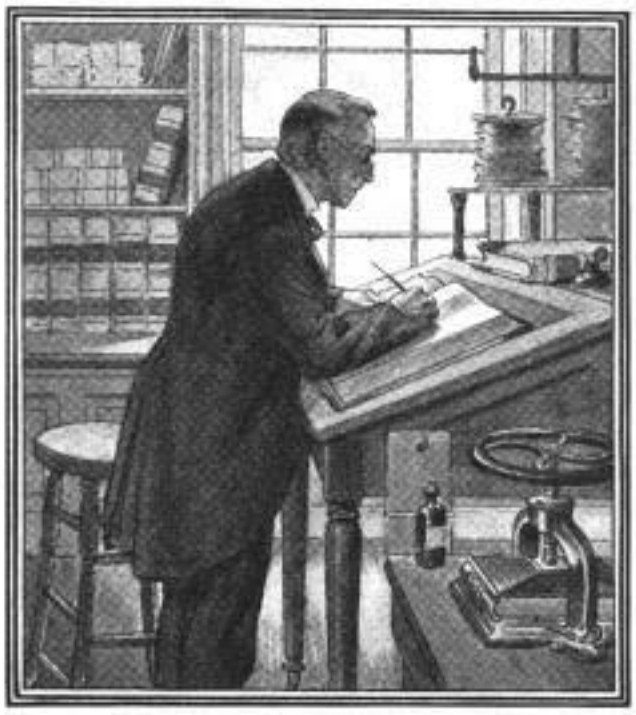
"SIGN HERE"

The negro messenger stood with blotter ready, fearful lest the Secretary should keep him after four o'clock. "Neither do I," he said, "but sign here."

The Secretary signed.

A Law-Abiding Citizen

REPRESENTATIVE J. A. T. HULL, of Iowa, sent some garden seeds from Washington to a constituent this spring. They came from the Department of Agriculture and were inclosed in one of the regular franked Government envelopes. On the corner of each of these envelopes appears this legend: "Penalty for private use, $300."



A few days later Mr. Hull received a letter from his constituent which read: "Dear Mr. Hull: I don't know what to do about those garden seeds you sent me. I notice it is $300 fine for private use. I don't want to use them for the public. I want to plant them in my private garden. I can't afford to pay $300 for the privilege. Won't you see if you can't fix it so I can use them privately, for I am a law-abiding citizen and do not want to commit any crime."

The Passing of Old Business Methods

HOW THE NEW OFFICE DIFFERS FROM THE OLD IN APPEARANCE, PERSONNEL AND EQUIPMENT

By A. W. Shaw

BENDING LABORIOUSLY OVER THESE IMPRESSIVE FOLIOS

HOW radical has been the revolution in business methods within recent years is perhaps best realized by bringing to mind a picture of a representative office of the old school in contrast with one of the modern type in which method has reached its highest attainment.

Rows and stacks of massive books, in bindings of leather, buckram or canvas that would have done good service as armor for a knight, are the most conspicuous and impressive objects in the unmodified old-school office. Their very bulk is awesome to the uninitiated, and the young candidate for honors in the accounting craft naturally looks upon the huge and pretentious tomes as little short of Sacred Books. The right to handle them is dignity enough for a novice, but the authority to contribute to their records is a goal for young ambition. These ponderous volumes sprawl over the generous spaces of high-standing desks. Bending laboriously over these impressive folios are men of mature years; serious, thoughtful men whose bearing betrays the conviction that the bookkeeper's craft is regarded in the dignity of a profession; men who hold in conscious pride their ability to carry in memory the remotest details of their business; men who have been well reared and well schooled; men who discharge their tasks with deliberation—possibly with facility also—and who have an air of modest importance in speaking of their ten, twenty, perhaps thirty, years of service. Their handwriting is that of the accomplished penman, their hands are thin and delicate, their bearing has a possible suggestion of "gentlemen of cloth." The young acolytes who serve under the old-school accountants take on the color and tone of their environment and preserve an attitude of grave respect to their superiors.

A heavy copy-press is manipulated by the beginner, who finds hours of employment in laboriously indexing, in the front of the book, the letters he has copied into the body of the volume, flapping and half-folding the leaves to accomplish this task.

If the office contains a typewriter it is of the ordinary pattern. Standing on desk tops and shelves are rows of yellow-backed letter files, or, if the office is of pronounced antiquity, the letters are neatly tied with colored tape into little bundles.

Where the old-school spirit, with its solemn pride and dignity, holds full sway, the furniture is of black walnut, rich with the tone of age and the polish of long usage. But the keynote of the old-school office is the massive, imposing bound book, a type of the old idea of stability and security in accounting.

Such are the aspect and atmosphere of the representative office of the old school. Thousands and tens of thousands of these business houses may be found to-day in every State and Territory; they are encountered in the thriving metropolis as well as in the small town. Upon the army of offices of this more pronounced old-school type the aggressive modern spirit of scientific method and up-to-date system in business is making constant inroad and effecting partial modifications, a gradual effacement of black-walnut tendencies and the ponderous dignity of leather-bound tomes.

Contrast this type of office with one which is ideal in every modern appointment—a model office of the latest kind in respect to both method and equipment.

Instantly the observant eye misses from the landscape of the new office the familiar mountain peaks that loomed so impressively in the old outlook: the great, bulky ledgers, journals and other volumes of record. Instead, the central feature is the modern filing case. Where the big books sprawled over long desks are trim little oaken trays with their sharply-focused complement of index cards. The long rows of unsightly paper-board filing cases are not in evidence, having been happily supplanted by the trim and attractive vertical filing cases. Various small machines and devices wholly foreign to the old-school office at once come into view of the observer, but among them is not to be seen the formidable old-fashioned copying-press.

The device in the model office which in appearance vaguely suggests the letter press is that for the duplication of typewritten "form" letters and circular letters—the "silent salesman," as it has aptly been called. Another piece of mechanism sure to command the attention of the observant investigator of the model office of latest type is the envelope sealer. Like all of the devices which make up the mechanical equipment of the complete up-to-date office, this envelope sealer is small, compact, and of artistic appearance.

Standing where it is most accessible to the busiest accountants is that marvel of modern ingenuity, the adding machine—a device which seems possessed of almost human intelligence and of more than human accuracy.

On the desks of those persons who handle correspondence is a device for stamping the day, hour and minute when the letter, order or document is officially received by the house. Not only is time the essence of all contracts, but in the nervous haste of business as it is done to-day time is also the essence of all transactions, and especially is it the very life of all correspondence. Consequently the time stamp is an essential part of the mechanism of the model office.

The Silent Salesman's Regiment

A FIRST lieutenant to the "silent salesman," or machine for the extensive duplication of typewritten "form letters," is a device for mechanically addressing the envelopes to firms or persons on the regular "house list." And a most interesting and valuable piece of office mechanism this is. Its work is performed with a swiftness calculated to put to shame the most skillful penman or operator of the typewriter.

Numerous rubber stamps, a machine for protecting bank checks against alteration, postal scales for keeping down the expenditures for postage stamps, a little grindstone for sharpening pencils, fountain pens, and various other devices complete the physical equipment of the ideal office.

But the change goes deeper than this; the personnel and the atmosphere of the place are wholly different from that of the typical office of the old school. An air of audacious youthfulness is instantly apparent. Venerable and dignified accountants no longer peer thoughtfully at you from their high stools. They are gone, leaving the field to girls and boys in their teens and to young men who press buttons, give quick, sharp orders and move as if there were not other days ahead. Gone is the atmosphere of quiet deliberation! Obliterated every trace of aristocratic black-walnut self-satisfaction. Everywhere is the spirit of push, dash, hustle!

Where once the manager almost deferentially consulted the old accountant—that oracle of memory—regarding his recollection of transactions, a girl in short skirts or a beardless lad in the pride of his first long trousers is told to bring the record from the filing case. Daily, if not hourly, the aggressive young man in authority is handed various form reports of the card or loose-leaf order which he scans with a quick, searching glance, and then issues a series of orders plainly indicating that the little card or leaf has given him a fresh survey of his business situation, that it has "in the twinkling of an eye" taken him to a high place from which he has secured a swift and sweeping outlook upon the kingdoms of opportunity immediately open before him.

Where have the fine, thoughtful and genteel old accountants in their black frock coats betaken themselves? Go into every big establishment which sends out thousands of envelopes addressed in longhand and you may see long tables at which are seated scores and hundreds of displaced accountants of the old school.

An advertisement inserted in the want columns of a New York or Chicago newspaper will any day bring half a hundred of these men to your desk. And you will find them content to earn a dollar a day, while the offer of twice that amount will startle their sad, wrinkled faces into something like the ghost of a smile.

Not long ago, in one of the great merchandizing houses of the East, I looked at a great room fitted with long tables at which were seated hundreds of these old accountants addressing envelopes. Their black garments were worn shiny, their home-laundered collars and cuffs were limp and frayed, their sober black neckties were the handiwork of faithful old wives, and their faces were all touched with the subdued gloom that belongs to the countenance of the vanquished.

"How much do they earn?" I asked the alert young man who had taken me to the room—a department manager whose salary was probably $10,000 a year.

"An average of perhaps a dollar a day. And most of them were fine accountants under the old order of things—intelligent, well-born, well-reared and often scholarly men. But they've fallen under the wheels of mechanical progress. They, the old veterans, have literally changed places with the mere novices of the business. They are doing the work that the green apprentice in his teens did in the old days and slips of girls and beardless boys are doing their work. Tough, isn't it?"

"Yes," I answered, "it's about the most pitiful sight I ever saw."

But the reason for their displacement was clear. They could not adapt themselves to new conditions and methods. Their attitude, training and traditions were wholly antagonistic to the new order and the new methods. They had held on to the old places at the top as long as they could, and had then dropped to the very bottom of the craft.

The Elimination of the Element of Error

ALREADY we have taken a glimpse of the equipment and the personnel of the model—1903—office; now let us go back of these and examine the methods that are distinctively of the latest day and hour. Following a natural order, first take the buying of goods: the old way was laboriously to write, in longhand, a letter, which was made of record by passing through the copying-press. The copy thus produced was often blurred and indistinct. Later, this was varied by using the typewriter, but still employing the copying-press. Now, in the ideal office, what is the process?

With a fountain pen or a typewriter specially adapted to manifolding, the order is written into the open spaces of a blank form. With one writing, or practically no additional labor for duplication, the record is manifolded as follows: original outgoing order; a duplicate for the receiving department; a card for following up the order and seeing that delivery is properly made. Often there is another duplicate for the special information of the executive having supervision of general expenditures.

There is great economy of time and labor in this process of manifolding, but its greatest advantage by far is in the absolute accuracy which it insures. There is no possible chance for mistakes in copying. All of the records must be absolutely identical because the duplication is mechanical. This principle has brought into use the open-panel envelope. Mistakes in addressing envelopes are much more frequent than mistakes in the superscription of orders, invoices and the like, because this labor, as a rule, is more carelessly and hurriedly done and because inclosures will be slipped into the wrong envelopes.

Any possibility of these blunders is forestalled by the use of the open-panel envelope, which has a rectangular opening, about three inches long and one inch wide, cut into the face of the envelope where the address would ordinarily be written.

The inclosures are of a size and form to bring, when folded, the name and address of the firm in the opening of the panel, like a picture in a frame. Not only does this save the addressing of the envelope, but prevents the possibility of mistakes in addressing, or of putting the inclosures into the wrong envelopes. These envelopes are used for purchase orders, invoices, acknowledgments, and almost all forms of accounting correspondence.

The duplicate of the purchase order sent to the receiving department is there checked, as the goods come in, and returned to the accounting desk for filing.

The modern system for carrying the stock of the ordinary wholesale business, for example, can be only briefly suggested here. Its pivotal point is that the record must be in the form of a perpetual inventory, made from the basis of the card duplicate of the purchase order. From the latter an analytical card record is made—one card for each article. These cards are filed between "guides" in an arrangement which makes it possible instantly to determine the itemized or the total purchases of any stock and the disbursements of stock by items and totals. Of course, goods are disbursed only on presentation of a requisition card showing the proper authority for distribution. The number of each requisition is noted on the stock card when the deduction of its amount from the total of that stock is made, as are also the numbers of the receiving slips when stock additions are recorded.

No modern merchandizing establishment, however small, will be without a stockkeeper. He may be assigned additional duties if the duties of his position are not sufficient to occupy all his time. Sound methods dictate that the merchant shall do business upon the smallest stock possible without the danger of discommoding customers, as depreciation of stock and loss of interest on the amount invested in surplus goods eat into profits. The new method involves a mechanical system which shall automatically indicate the low points and the high points in stock by signals which cheap help can understand. Maximum and minimum limits on each stock are established by the responsible executive. The stock cards are so tagged, by a little metal indicator moving along the top, that low, normal and high limits are indicated at a glance. Those showing the danger points at the two extremes are each day picked out by the girl or boy attending to these cards and are taken to the stock manager. Instantly he has the whole situation under his eye. His time is not taken up by long investigations to acquire this information. He is free to earn his salary by thinking in the interests of the house.

How Modern Correspondence is Handled

THE selling system of a fairly modern house is too vast a subject to be more than suggested here. First consider the correspondence. Not long ago I went into an Eastern office which embodied all the old-school traditions. The man who turned out eight or ten letters a day thought he had done well. Every line was framed with as much study as if he had not done hundreds of such letters before. He did not get above his correspondence and see that his letters naturally divided themselves into distinct classes. In the model office, to-day, this analysis is carried to a fine point. Trained correspondents dictate the letters. Often their dictation is sprinkled by references like this: "Form 3, paragraph 10." This refers the stenographer to a set of "model letters" carefully framed to meet constantly recurring conditions. Often a large house pays a "Correspondence Expert" a handsome fee to write for each department a set of these model letters. Again, in dictating answers to letters, the original is simply numbered in pencil by the correspondent, and the stenographer later gets from the original the name and address of the person or house for which the answer is intended. This saves much of the time of the man who has scores or hundreds of letters to dictate each day. Letters and carbon duplicates of answers are filed together in a vertical filing case, and are indexed—perhaps several times cross-indexed—in the cards which furnish the key to the vertical files.

Customers are the basis of all commercial operations, consequently of all schemes for indexing the correspondence of a business. Open the drawer of the customer's card index in the model office and what do you see? Ordinarily a set of colored guide-cards bearing the names of States; between these are customers' cards arranged in alphabetical order. This is the most ordinary and elemental arrangement. Sometimes, however, the names of the traveling men employed by the house appear on the guide-cards with sub-indexing according to cities and towns within that salesman's territory. Another arrangement is according to lines of business. Each customer's card presents a complete picture of his relations with the house, showing the amount of his purchases for each month and for a period of years. A glance shows, for example, that he bought fewer goods, by far, this month than last, and that his purchases for February, 1903, were $1000 less than for February, 1902. That customer needs a careful letter of inquiry, and the traveling man to whose list he belongs needs a sharp reminder.

A Calendar that Almost Thinks

WHAT is called the "follow-up" cabinet generally contains a list of actual and of prospective customers. To the former are sent quotations, new catalogues, announcements, reminders, and all kinds of form letters adapted to those already having active relations with the house. To the possible customers are sent circulars, booklets and a variety of follow-up literature. Running across the top of each card is a "traveling calendar" consisting of a horizontal row of figures and a "sliding tag." The purpose of this arrangement is to enable the clerk instantly to select from a drawer full of cards those bearing names and addresses to which literature should be simultaneously sent. For example, let us suppose this to be the fifth of the month. The person addressing follow-up literature opens the drawer, readily locates the first tag resting on "5" and removes it. Of course, all the other tags resting on the same figure are the same distance from the left-hand edge of the card and are picked out as rapidly as the fingers can move. As each piece of literature is addressed the tag on the corresponding card is moved forward to the figure indicating the next date on which the customer should again hear from the house.

The movements of salesmen are kept track of by means of a map spotted with tags. This is to keep the salesmen posted with reminders for special calls and other information calculated to influence him to go outside his regular routine. Salesmen are also furnished with a "quotation" pad. Whenever one quotes a price he is not only obliged to put it "in black and white," but the record is manifolded in triplicate—one copy for the customer, one to be retained by the salesman and one (in the form of a card) for the house. There it is attached to the customer's card and is the basis for a careful "follow-up" of the quotation. This makes salesmen conservative in quoting prices, prevents collusion between customer and salesman, and prevents possibility of mistake or dispute.

System makes for exactness, for facility, for conservatism; and the wholesaler should feel it as much his duty as his advantage persistently to educate his customers in better methods. This will make his own work easier and the business of his customer sounder.

From the customer's cards are made up the analytical records, upon which the management may well spend hours of the most careful thought. "Bulk" comparisons are misleading. One salesman may sell, at ruling prices, twice the goods of another, and yet may make but half the profit to his employers. Let me take the case of a large paint house. Net profits on mixed paints were large; on varnishes they were small. A salesman made a big showing in bulk sales, but the analytical card record showed that he had made the house much less money than the salesman with a very modest total showing, but who was "strong on mixed paints." Every weak point is brought out by a properly devised "analytical card record" which shows where to push and where to relax. It also reveals the special conditions as to trade, cost of transportation, etc., in each locality.

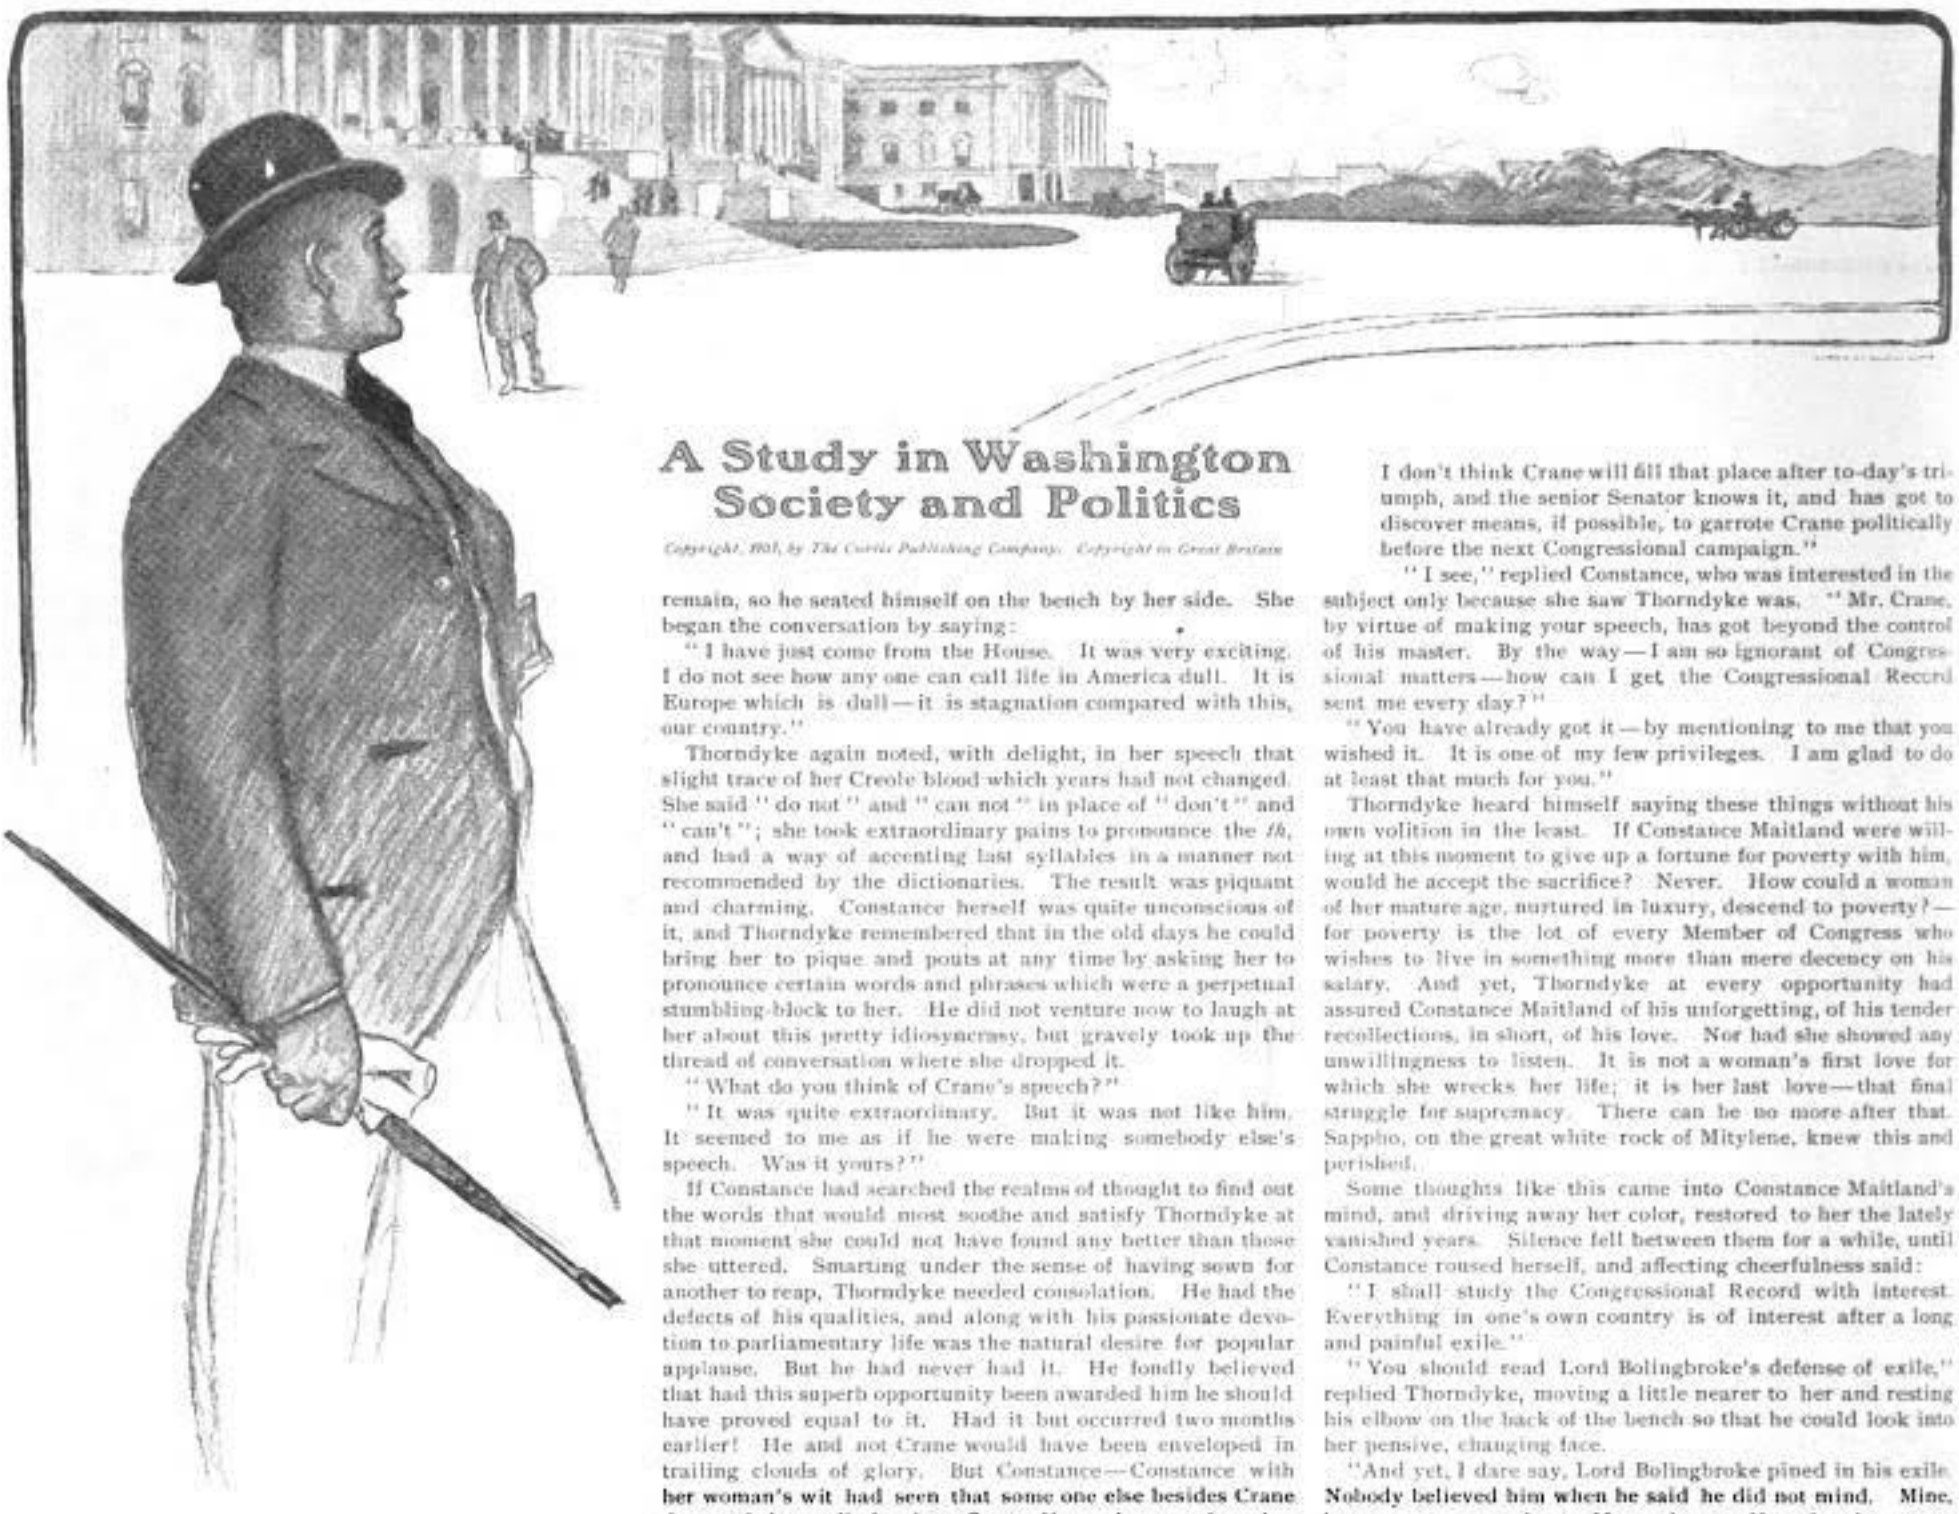
Under the old régime the entries in the "order book" were checked, stamped or "crossed off" as filled; then the book was sent to the accounting-room to serve as the basis for the invoices. There was constant friction between the shipping and accounting departments over the use of the book, and consequently perpetual inconvenience. Now the order is manifolded, giving one "loose-leaf" copy to the sales department, one to the shipping clerk, one is retained in the order department, and perhaps another for some special official. The same duplicating process makes the bills of lading and the shipping tags, and again it produces, at a single stroke, the invoice, the statement, the blank for the credit and collecting department and the entry on the sales journal—the latter being made up of "loose leaves" until securely bound together in binder or cover. Compare this with the old method of perpetual copying and recopying, with the errors and loss of time inevitably involved. In the ideal office this will be carried still further, another duplicate "leaf" from the invoice record being filed in a system of drawers to serve as a ledger.

In following up accounts the "traveling calendar" serves as a mechanical reminder and classifier as effectively as in the matter of "follow-up" literature. A color scheme of the tags indicates the condition of the accounts—a red tag, for example, showing the account to have been placed in the hands of the attorney.

Of course, all funds received and expended should be put through the bank. There is no exception to this rule in the model office. In the ideal office the cash or bank journal will be a most important factor in accounting. This will be a loose-leaf affair with a perpendicular perforation. A portion of it laps over so that the column containing the amounts of checks, drafts, money orders, currency and other forms of remittances will be produced in duplicate, while the names of the parties making payment and the column for stamps, discounts or miscellaneous deductions will not be duplicated. The latter section, after the sheet has been torn along the line of perforation, is retained by the depositor and forms a complete record of receipts, from which postings are made to the individual accounts. The other part, which is sent to the bank, records only the funds for deposit, the figures being mechanically duplicated. This makes the bank check up the depositor's books. There is no chance for difference between your own account and the deposit slip, no opportunity for transposition of figures with awkward complications at the bank. Here, also, is where the swift and certain adding machine makes itself useful.

The Close-Range System of Accounting

IN THE old-school office the purchase ledger was made up by copying the items from incoming bills into the journal and then posting. Under the present practice, the original bills are pasted upon sheets or leaves of a "loose-leaf" book and the amounts are entered at "close range," in debit and credit columns at the right, each sheet being numbered and each bill on the sheet being lettered or numbered consecutively in the corner. In the purchase journal, where the accounts are distributed, these numbers serve as marks of identification and the entering of names is unnecessary.



From the "loose-leaf" books which I have described the accounts are posted, at the end of the month, into the general ledger of the house. With accuracy in posting the totals from the sheets the general ledger is almost bound to balance, because the items of the "loose-leaf" journals have been produced by the manifold process and the additions have been mechanical.

Perhaps the keynote of the modern office—aside from accuracy and dispatch—is the elimination of expensive help. Where, under the old system, five good accountants at twenty-five dollars a week were required, now the same labor is more easily and efficiently done by one good man at thirty-five dollars and four cheap assistants at four dollars to ten dollars. This is not a pleasing prospect from a strictly humanitarian viewpoint, but it is business, and we cannot circumvent the laws of progress, however much we may be puzzled in deciphering its compensations and its final relation to universal justice.

CHAPTER II

OUT in the spring sunshine, that flooded the plaza and the parklike gardens and blazed upon the golden dome of the fair white National Library, visible beyond the fringe of great green trees, Thorndyke looked about him for Constance Maitland. She was just stepping into a smart little brougham with a good-looking pair of brown cobs, and drove away toward the quiet, shady, beautiful but unfashionable part of the town at the east.

The carriage went slowly and Thorndyke, pursuing it, saw it stop a few blocks from the Capitol, by one of those parks large enough for one to wander in and feel alone as if in the woods. Constance descended from the carriage holding her skirts daintily, and walked into the park. Thorndyke boldly followed her—she had said to-morrow—and this was to-morrow.

He came upon her in a few minutes in a little open space, shut in, except for the pathway on every side, by shrubbery. The grass was full of daisies which had just put on their little white shirts and yellow caps, and a pair of robins hopped about with as much gayety and freedom as if they were country robins instead of town robins.

Constance was sitting on a rusty iron bench, a little in the shade. She had taken off her gloves, and her hands, small and innocent of rings, lay in her lap. She seemed to be day-dreaming, as if she were eighteen instead of thirty-eight years of age. Thorndyke was pleased to see that by the searching light of day she did not look nearly so young as in the mysterious night. But she was not the less charming on that account—she had simply reached the fullness of her development in mind, in feeling, and even in beauty.

As Thorndyke took off his hat and bowed to her he received a distinct invitation, by means of her eyes and smile, to remain, so he seated himself on the bench by her side. She began the conversation by saying:

"I have just come from the House. It was very exciting. I do not see how any one can call life in America dull. It is Europe which is dull—it is stagnation compared with this, our country."

Thorndyke again noted, with delight, in her speech that slight trace of her Creole blood which years had not changed. She said "do not" and "can not" in place of "don't" and "can't"; she took extraordinary pains to pronounce the th, and had a way of accenting last syllables in a manner not recommended by the dictionaries. The result was piquant and charming. Constance herself was quite unconscious of it, and Thorndyke remembered that in the old days he could bring her to pique and pouts at any time by asking her to pronounce certain words and phrases which were a perpetual stumbling-block to her. He did not venture now to laugh at her about this pretty idiosyncrasy, but gravely took up the thread of conversation where she dropped it.

"What do you think of Crane's speech?"

"It was quite extraordinary. But it was not like him. It seemed to me as if he were making somebody else's speech. Was it yours?"

If Constance had searched the realms of thought to find out the words that would most soothe and satisfy Thorndyke at that moment she could not have found any better than those she uttered. Smarting under the sense of having sown for another to reap, Thorndyke needed consolation. He had the defects of his qualities, and along with his passionate devotion to parliamentary life was the natural desire for popular applause. But he had never had it. He fondly believed that had this superb opportunity been awarded him he should have proved equal to it. Had it but occurred two months earlier! He and not Crane would have been enveloped in trailing clouds of glory. But Constance—Constance with her woman's wit had seen that some one else besides Crane deserved the credit for that effort. He made no reply to her questions beyond a slight smile, but he let it be seen that she had hit the white.

"Mr. Crane tells me he knows you," he said presently.

"Yes," answered Constance. "He has been a few times to see me. Last night I met him at the ball at the British Embassy. I danced with him."

"He owned up to me some time ago that he was taking dancing lessons—at forty-two, with a wife and children in Circleville. I fancy his performance answers the description that Herodotus gives of the dancing of Hippoclides—it is diverting to himself, but disgusting to others."

"On the contrary, he dances very well—when he is not trying to do his best. Perhaps you are surprised that I should still care to dance—but remember, pray, my mother was Creole French."

And to this Thorndyke made a speech which brought the blood into Constance Maitland's cheeks, knocking ten years off her age at once.

"I remember everything," he said.

After a moment's pause Constance, still with a heightened color, continued:

"I have seen Mr. Crane several times this winter—not only in my own house, but in others. Whenever I am with him I am consumed with pity for him."

"He does not need your pity now," said Thorndyke grimly. "It is more needed by his senior Senator who is the fly-wheel of the political machine in his State. The old gentleman, I know, is at this minute walking the floor in his committee-room and gnashing his teeth over Crane's success."

"He ought to be ashamed of himself—ungenerous creature!" hastily interjected Constance.

"Senator Bicknell took Crane up, sent him to Congress and thought he had secured a really efficient understrapper. I don't think Crane will fill that place after to-day's triumph, and the senior Senator knows it, and has got to discover means, if possible, to garrote Crane politically before the next Congressional campaign."

"I see," replied Constance, who was interested in the subject only because she saw Thorndyke was. "Mr. Crane, by virtue of making your speech, has got beyond the control of his master. By the way—I am so ignorant of Congressional matters—how can I get the Congressional Record sent me every day?"

"You have already got it—by mentioning to me that you wished it. It is one of my few privileges. I am glad to do at least that much for you."

Thorndyke heard himself saying these things without his own volition in the least. If Constance Maitland were willing at this moment to give up a fortune for poverty with him, would he accept the sacrifice? Never. How could a woman of her mature age, nurtured in luxury, descend to poverty?—for poverty is the lot of every Member of Congress who wishes to live in something more than mere decency on his salary. And yet, Thorndyke at every opportunity had assured Constance Maitland of his unforgetting, of his tender recollections, in short, of his love. Nor had she showed any unwillingness to listen. It is not a woman's first love for which she wrecks her life; it is her last love—that final struggle for supremacy. There can be no more after that. Sappho, on the great white rock of Mitylene, knew this and perished.

Some thoughts like this came into Constance Maitland's mind, and driving away her color, restored to her the lately vanished years. Silence fell between them for a while, until Constance roused herself, and affecting cheerfulness said:

"I shall study the Congressional Record with interest. Everything in one's own country is of interest after a long and painful exile."

"You should read Lord Bolingbroke's defense of exile," replied Thorndyke, moving a little nearer to her and resting his elbow on the back of the bench so that he could look into her pensive, changing face.

"And yet, I dare say, Lord Bolingbroke pined in his exile. Nobody believed him when he said he did not mind. Mine, however, was complete. My uncle, von Hesselt, who was an honorable man in his way, thought he was carrying out my aunt's wishes by keeping me wholly away from all Americans and wholly with foreigners."

"But you could have left him after you were of age."

"Ah, you do not know! He was the most terrible sufferer you can imagine for fifteen years. And what was worse, he was surrounded by people, his own relatives, who, I truly believe, would have shortened his life if they could. He knew this, and feared it even more than was reasonable. Once my longing for my country became such that it overcame me, and I told my uncle I must, I must come to America. He pleaded with me—imagine an old man, whose life was one long stretch of pain and fear, pleading with you until he fell prone in a paroxysm of despair? I, too, was in despair, and I promised him I would remain with him during his life—I hardly knew what I was saying—I was not twenty-one at the time—but I knew well enough after it was said. I kept my word, and I nursed him through his last illness and closed his eyes in death. Then, as soon as all was over, I sailed for America. I feel now as if I never wished to see Europe again."

"And did Baron von Hesselt realize the enormous sacrifice you made for him?"

"Yes—that is, partly."

"Your aunt certainly was most unjust to you," said Thorndyke coolly. "I mean that provision robbing you of all your fortune in case you marry an American."

"Yes, very unjust," replied Constance with equal coolness, although the flush returned to her cheeks.

"And I—I was to blame for that," cried Thorndyke, venturing further upon ticklish ground.

"Not altogether," replied Constance, maintaining the steadiness of her voice. "My aunt hated our country—she belonged to the old régime at the South—she could not forget the Civil War—and she meant—poor soul, I forgive her now—that I should never return to America permanently. It was a strange thing to do—but I must admit my aunt to have been in some respects both a strange and a foolish woman. Let us not speak of her again. I am back, and if I feel as I do now I shall never live in Europe again. It is time for me to prepare to grow old."

She said this with a wan little smile, and all at once thought with terror of her age—there was but four or five years' difference between Thorndyke and herself, and that difference, at a certain point, becomes transferred to the gentleman's side of the ledger. Suddenly the spring afternoon seemed to become melancholy and overcast. A sharp wind sprang up from the near-by river—the world turned from gold to gray. At the same moment Thorndyke and Constance rose and walked away from the spot that had been only a little while ago so sweet and sunny.

"Why is it," asked Constance, as they followed the pathway leading out of the park, "a spring morning is the merriest thing in life, and a spring evening the saddest?"

"Why should anything be sad to you—spring evenings or any other times?" asked Thorndyke, quietly and with perfect sincerity.

"Why should any one be sad at all? Because we are human, I suppose," was Constance's answer to this.

As they came out upon the streets, which were less deserted than usual, Thorndyke looked toward the south wing of the Capitol. The flag was fluttering down from its flagstaff.

"The House has adjourned," he said, "and some history has been made to-day—likewise a great reputation for our friend Crane."

The brougham was driving up and down, and the coachman perceiving the graceful black figure on the sidewalk drove toward them. Thorndyke observed, with disgust, the elegance of the turnout—the two perfectly matched cobs, the silver-mounted harness of Spanish leather, the miniature brougham with "C. M." in cipher on the panels—the whole must have cost about half his yearly income. This, together with Crane's remarkable triumph, made him surly, and he said stiffly, as he assisted Constance into the brougham:

"You gave me permission to call to-day."

"Yes, but I withdraw it. It is now nearly three o'clock. I have not had my luncheon, I am tired and I must rest this afternoon, and I go out to dinner. To-morrow at five."

Her tone and manner discounted her words. It was as if she were saying: "I must save something for to-morrow—I will not be a spendthrift of my joys." Thorndyke, finding nothing to discompose him in her words, replied, in a very good humor:

"It is always to-morrow—but to-morrow is better than not at all. Good-by."

The brougham rolled off, and Thorndyke stepped aboard a street car bound for the west end.

At the Capitol plaza a great crowd got on, among them the two gentlemen whom Thorndyke affectionately described as his boss and Crane's boss. The two men stood together on the platform outside. Both of them revealed in their faces their mastery of men and affairs, for your true boss is necessarily a very considerable man. Senator Standiford, Thorndyke's boss, had an iron jaw, but his face was not altogether without a touch of ideality. Senator Bicknell, Crane's boss, had likewise a determined face, but his forehead and eyes betrayed the human weakness of liking clever men as his instruments. Both men were millionaires. Senator Standiford lived in three rooms at a hotel, rode in street cars, indulged his only daughter to the point of prodigality and gave liberally of his money to campaign funds, charities and his poor relations, but was never known to part with an atom of his power if he could help it. Senator Bicknell fared sumptuously every day, had a splendid house and gorgeous carriages, only rode in the street cars for a lark and was reported to be a skinflint in money matters, and somewhat foolishly lavish in giving away his power. The two men exchanged some words which Thorndyke, wedged inside as he was, could not but hear. Senator Standiford was saying to his colleague:

"S. M. & L. stock must be going down when you ride in a street car."

"I lost one of my coach-horses last night," replied Senator Bicknell, "and can't use my carriage to-day."

"Misfortunes never come singly," said Senator Standiford enigmatically, then adding, "I suppose it's in order to congratulate you on the success of your protégé, Crane, to-day?"

Thorndyke could scarcely keep from laughing at the look of chagrin which came over Senator Bicknell's countenance.

"Y-yes," he answered dubiously.

"Don't get in a panic," kept on Senator Standiford with rude good humor; "I know how it is with those fellows. Crane thinks from this day forth that you are a back number, an old fogy, and a dead cock in the pit. He will go into what he considers a grooming process for the next two years—oh, I know those fellows! He will kick up a lot of dust in the gubernatorial convention, will make a great display of not wanting the nomination, and will bide his time until your term expires. Then he will find it is a gruelling and not a grooming he has had, and he will get a small bunch of votes, but I don't think you need take the fellow seriously."

At this last sentence Senator Bicknell's face shone like the sun. It shone the more when Senator Standiford kept on:

"There's no reason to fear a man who makes a good speech——"

"I am in no fear of any one," gravely replied Senator Bicknell, who thought it essential to his dignity to say so much.

"It's the strong debater who is likely to become formidable. There's Thorndyke now—Crane has made the speech—largely Thorndyke's—but he is totally unequal to the running fire of debate. Thorndyke could do him up inside of ten minutes. Luckily for him, the debate will not be fierce—and Thorndyke will really conduct it."

A PREMEDITATED MEETING ON THE SENATOR'S PART

"Mr. Thorndyke is a very able man," said Senator Bicknell, as if thinking aloud.

"Yes, but totally without ambition," replied Senator Standiford gravely—and Thorndyke, within the car, laughed.

It was, however, no laughing matter, but Thorndyke, having chosen his rôle for better or for worse, could only cleave to it, forsaking all others. But he would see Constance Maitland the next day at five o'clock. There was balm in Gilead—or hasheesh in the pipe, he knew not exactly which.

CHAPTER III

LIFE is a battle and a march—especially public life. Thorndyke waked the next morning prepared for both a battle and a march. A glance at the morning newspapers showed that the country was entirely with the Congress, and the people, having given their orders, would see to it that these orders were promptly obeyed. The Continental press of Europe with few exceptions barked furiously. The French newspapers alone retained dignity and good sense, pointing out the inevitable trend of events, and advised that, instead of abusing the United States, they should copy it in that system which had made it great, not by war, but by peace. The English newspapers were fair, but in some of them bitterness was expressed at England being shouldered out of her place as the greatest of the world powers by the young giant of the West. There was in all of them, however, a note of triumph, that this first place had been lost only to an offshoot of the sturdy parent stock. This sentiment is often ridiculed as a peculiarly absurd form of national self-love, but there is, in reality, nothing ridiculous about it. As long as self-love is a part of nations and individuals so long will each nation and each individual strive to share in the general stock of glory, achievement and success. In the American newspapers the man most prominent was Crane. He was compared to Henry Clay, to Stephen A. Douglas, to any and every American public man who had early in life made a meteoric rise in Congress. He was represented as the embodiment of youth with the wisdom of age. One newspaper reckoned him to be a political Chatterton and called him "the Wondrous Boy." His beauty was lauded, his voice, his delivery, the fit of his trousers; and one enthusiastic journal in Indianapolis promptly nominated him for the Presidency. Thorndyke searched the newspapers carefully and did not find his own name once mentioned. He reflected upon Horace Greeley's remark that fame is a vapor.

Disappointing as it was to him to feel that another had reaped his harvest it did not give him acute pain; for he had waked that morning with the agreeable consciousness which comes occasionally to every human being—that the world is more interesting to-day than it was yesterday; that consciousness which illuminates the cold, gray stage of life and indicates that the lights are about to be turned up and the play to begin. The kind tones of Constance Maitland's voice were still in Thorndyke's ears, and the unmistakable look of interest in her soft eyes had visited him in dreams. He was no nearer marrying her than he had been at any time during the past eighteen years; the same obstacle was there—a very large, real, terrifying and obvious obstacle—but there was also a sweet and comforting suspicion in his mind that Constance, as well as himself, had cherished the idyl of their youth. And then, by daylight, she did not look so preposterously girlish as she had looked by moonlight and in ball dress. This gave Thorndyke considerable pleasure as he brushed the remnants of his hair into positions where they would do the most good. Her apparent advantage of him in the matter of youth and good looks had been disturbing to him at first. She still had much of youth and much good looks, but yet, a man with scanty hair and a grayish mustache would not look like an old fool beside her as he had feared.

Thorndyke, according to his custom, walked to the Capitol. The morning, like most spring mornings in Washington, was as beautiful as the first morning in the garden of Eden. He chose unfrequented streets, and passing under the long green arcades had only the trees for his companionship on his walk.

Instead of reaching the building by way of the plaza Thorndyke chose rather to ascend the long flights of steps leading upward from terrace to terrace on the west front. It is a way little used, but singularly beautiful with its lush greenness of shrubbery, and the noble view both of the building and the fair white city embosomed in trees, spread out like a dream city before the eye. Half-way up Thorndyke saw Senator Standiford sitting on one of the iron benches placed on the falls of the terrace. Thorndyke was surprised to see him there, and it occurred to him at once that it was a premeditated meeting on the Senator's part.

He was a tall, ugly old man with chin whiskers, but his appearance was redeemed by the power which spoke from his strongly marked face, and by his punctilious, old-fashioned dress and extreme neatness. He wore a silk hat made from a block he had used for thirty years. His coat, gray and wide-skirted, seemed of the same vintage, and his spotless collar of antique pattern, and his large black silk necktie might have been worn by Daniel Webster himself. A big pair of gold spectacles and a gold-headed cane completed a costume which was admirably harmonious, and produced the effect of an old lady in 1903 with the side curls and cap of 1853.

Much Ado About Nothing

WE REALLY seem to be developing a very pretty quarrel with Germany out of absolutely nothing at all. When we began matching navies with the Kaiser the thing was rather a joke. But they have such deadly serious editors and officers in Berlin that the American brand of humor is as dangerous there as baled guncotton. When the Hochwohlgeborener Generallieutenant Graf von Rivenlow hears that our tactful Dewey has said that our Caribbean squadron could thrash the whole German Navy, his mustaches bristle belligerently and he hammers the table with his stein while he proves that the American Navy is a collection of antiquated junk, that its manœuvres are childish, that its gunners can't shoot, and that its mongrel crews are deserting by shiploads. Then the German editors mutter "Ganz gut!" and ink flows like beer in every sanctum in Berlin.

There are amusing features of this paper warfare, but it has its painful side, too. Of course, we can hardly help laughing when the American Navy, with its century and a quarter of vigorous activity, and its splendid record of victory in eight wars, is accused of "immaturity" and the "faults of childhood" by the subjects of an empire thirty-two years old whose flag has never floated in a real naval battle. And our sense of humor is tickled, too, when we see the identical criticisms that lulled the Spaniards into their fatal security repeated word for word as if the history of 1898 were a blank. Nevertheless, we are not without fault for the present deplorable friction between the German and American people. We ought to have treated the Kaiser's amicable advances with more respect. We ought to have carefully refrained from saying anything that could cause ill-feeling in Germany. National animosities are more dangerously inflamed by insults than by injuries. It may be true that Germany's secret aspirations are inconsistent with our national policy. It may be true that her naval program was framed for future use against the United States. These things, if we believed them to be so, would give cause for watchfulness, and for quiet naval preparations of our own, but not for offensive talk.

For the past four years the attitude of the German Government toward us has been not only correct but friendly, and not only friendly but cordial. It is our duty to accept its assurances at their face value, and not to display any doubt of its good faith until it gives us cause to do so. Meanwhile, no country can take offense if on general principles we bring our navy up to a proper standard. It would be perfectly harmless, and might be useful to the world at large, for an American admiral to inform mankind that our fleet was strong enough to defend the Monroe Doctrine and the Panama Canal against any force that might attempt to interfere with either of them. It is unnecessary and offensive to announce that our navy can lick the Kaiser's with one hand tied behind its back. Both Germans and Yankees are pretty good fellows, and a really serious quarrel between them would be a calamity to the world.

Some Moral Antitoxins

NOW that the Easter vacation is over and the boys have gone back to school, the house suddenly grows silent and empty, and you and your wife sit down to the quiet meals with a dull tug at your hearts.

It is likely that all your work for years and all your hopes for the rest of your life have gone into the making up of those two big hobbledehoys. They are to have the chance that you missed; they are to have the learning, the ease of manner, the fortune and the fame which did not come to you. You forget now all the plans that you once made for your own development, but you know just how much money you must stint and lay by at home presently to give Tom a couple of years' study under German specialists and Bob a finish at Oxford. The boys are to you the flower of humanity—though your neighbor finds them, compared to his Jim, dull and loutish cubs. Nor does it ever occur to you that in every house in the world some such miracle of perverted vision is going on—for God's good purposes.

There are two or three facts about these boys, however, which you are apt to overlook. One is that they are not only your dependents and your imitators, but your judges.

When your children are about eight years old they suddenly waken to the truth that you are not a god nor an infallible Pope, but human like themselves. Their eyes are on you if you break into a rage or let slip an oath or a lie. That code of perfect living, that love to God and to man which you have been teaching them—do you live up to it? Even that child upon your knee finds you guilty sometimes. But when Tom and Bob come back from school to read you with a boy's keen, instructed eyes, it is not well for you if you have made clean your face and forgotten some vile dead secret inside your heart.

Another hint: Don't force Tom into a medical school or Bob into the law because that suits your plans or convenience. The fact that you have given up your life for theirs does not give you control over their lives. If your boy is born with irresistible dominating talent for any art or trade, thank God and at once set him at it. If not, study his abilities and give them a free chance. Better he should make a false start in life than feel in his old age that he had been driven by others like a donkey from the beginning. A man who had been long the controller of large affairs once said:

"A young man's success or failure in life does not depend so much on his talents or chances as on his temperament. Your cheery, vain, self-reliant fellow will leave his despondent, humble-minded brother who has twice his ability far behind in the race."

If Tom is given to brag and swagger, snub him. But if Bob lags behind, always doubtful of himself, don't be afraid to inoculate him with self-respect; give him work for a time in which he will have authority over men who are his inferiors.

There are antitoxins for poisons of the soul as well as the body, if we are wise enough to use them.

A National Fit of Indigestion

A GOOD deal of fun has been poked at Mr. Morgan recently for saying that the only obstacle to the further expansion of our prosperity is the mass of "undigested securities." It is undoubtedly a peculiar phrase, and instantly lends itself to such humorous suggestions as that the reasons for the securities being "undigested" is the usual reason for failure to digest—indigestibility. But anything can be turned into a joke—happily—and the jests do not affect the expressiveness of the phrase or its accuracy in describing the peculiar conditions now prevailing in this country.

The big financiers have organized within a few years a very large number of enormous enterprises. Now, the business of a financier is not to create enterprises for the purpose of keeping them, but to create them for sale to the investing public. The investing public is satisfied with the interest and dividends, the four to eight per cent. regularly coming in; the financier wants the larger profit that comes to him who thinks out new projects and puts them into effect, and disposes of the results that he may release his capital for larger profits which he had to put off until his capital had grown. If he cannot dispose of his completed project his capital continues locked up in it and brings him only interest or dividends at the small rate; and the larger projects must wait.

That was what Mr. Morgan meant by "undigested securities." Large enterprises have been undertaken so rapidly that the financiers have on their hands enormous quantities of stocks and bonds which they cannot dispose of and so free their capital for the still larger enterprises which the rapidly developing resources of the country have brought into view. And the big financiers are impatiently waiting for the country to "digest" the securities so that they may put their capital where it can earn forty and fifty per cent. and more—the large returns that have ever come to the man who has the three great qualities for large business enterprises: capital, courage and common-sense.

There are two aspects of this condition of tardy digestion—one cheerful, the other not so cheerful.

The cheerful aspect is that so long as the capital of the big fellows is locked up in these enterprises they will have the best possible management. If Mr. Morgan or Mr. Rockefeller owns tens of millions of dollars of the stock of an industrial or a railway, he will give that industrial or railway a degree of personal attention which it would not get if it represented to him only an insignificant fraction of his fortune. The rarest talent in the world to-day, as always, is executive ability; and never has there been such a clamorous demand for it as in this country at the present time. Workers there are a-plenty; routine men a-plenty; men a-plenty capable to obey orders and to execute other people's ideas. But men able to create ideas and to execute them—only a few. Now, while in one way it might be advantageous for the big men to be able to free their capital so that they could employ it in building new railroads, new factories, in another way it is just as well that they are compelled to dry-nurse as well as to wet-nurse their projects.

The less cheerful aspect of this condition of tardy digestion is that it indicates the growing extravagance of the American people. Of course, thousands on thousands of us are going on in the old thrifty ways—are putting by a little at a time and emptying the full stocking into an investment in acres or mortgages, stocks or bonds. But more thousands—and those the quickest witted—are learning all too rapidly the lessons of extravagance.

It is not an evil, but the reverse, that a man should learn how personally to use what civilization puts at his service. Progress begins when a savage is tempted by what is to him a luxury and yields to the extent of going to work in order that he may earn it. But, while no man could define in general terms what wasteful extravagance means, no man except the born miser or the born spendthrift is ignorant of what is for him wasteful extravagance. And while to-day the rich are undoubtedly wastefully extravagant, the imitators of the rich, clear down the line from well-to-do to clerk and farm-hand, shop-girl and cook, are far outdoing the rich. The senseless notion that equality is asserted by throwing away money as if one had it "to burn" is rampant and is becoming "rampageous." Instead of investing in securities the earners are investing in extravagant tastes.

Without discussing the merits of these "undigested securities," the fact remains that with money never more plentiful among the great mass of the American people investments are going begging to-day that would have been eagerly taken up a dozen years ago. We are a nation of liberal spenders—and that is well, for the best is none too good for a sovereign American citizen. Nevertheless and notwithstanding, thrift is a virtue. And it has a mighty unpleasant way of reminding us of the fact—mighty unpleasant.

SINFUL PECK

PRICKLY HEAT

DURING the noon hour a steam launch towing a cascoe, or native lighter, crept up to the gangway, deposited a white-clad officer and two soldiers on the grating, then pulled the cascoe forward to the main chains, where her crew made her fast. The officer and soldiers climbed aboard, and Mr. Becker, called from his dinner by the watching steward at the forward companion, came out wiping his mouth.

"I'm an Inspector of Customs," said the officer. "I suppose you know that Manila is under martial law? Who is in charge of this ship?"

"I'm in charge, sir," answered Mr. Becker; "signed first mate and acting skipper while Captain Jackson's in the hospital. How's he getting on, sir? Have you heard?"

"Badly cut. How'd it happen? I only know that our men shot a nigger after he knifed the captain."

"Went daft and run amuck. Mr. Brown and me only got here yesterday from Singapore; but just after we got aboard out comes the Captain o' the Port wi' some sogers to 'rest the nigger. Then he turned loose with his knife an' the sogers shot him."

The officer nodded and said: "What became of the other first mate? Did he make trouble?"

"Not in any violent way," answered Mr. Becker with a grin. "Tried to hold his berth, but the Port Capt'n overruled him an' reinstated me. I put him 'fore the mast 'mong the men he'd been hazin'. Reckon that's his yap now. Listen."

From the forecastle came sounds of hoarse, but muffled, denunciatory voices, rising and falling; occasionally a higher note broke in—a quavering, angry voice, which, as they listened, grew louder, and finally dominated the others.

"Seems to be having an interesting time," said the officer dryly.

"Yes," answered Mr. Becker, still grinning. "He's among his own breed o' dog, but they've outlawed him. Sinful Peck, they call him."

The quavering voice ceased coincidently with a sound as of a bucket striking a bulkhead; there was an outburst of the hoarse tones, and then a little man shot out of the forecastle door, followed by a flying beef bone, which just missed his head and went overboard.

"That's him," said Mr. Becker. "That's the only Sinful Peck, the worst little devil for his draft that ever happened. Shot the second mate in the leg outside o' Singapore, an' then nursed him like a son. When I broke my leg he pulled me through. Skipper went overboard on a big sea, an' Sinful went after him. That's why he was taken aft."

"He nursed you, do you say, and saved the captain's life? Yet you reduce him as soon as you get charge?"

"Why not? He shipped 'fore the mast. I don't need him aft."

"Let me see the the ship's papers," said the officer coldly.

"I'll get 'em. Not much on 'em, I reckon, as the ship's in ballast."

"Wait," said the officer as Mr. Becker turned to enter the cabin. "That man is coming. I am interested in him."

The little man was marching aft with a businesslike stride, and behind him men were flocking out of the two forecastle doors and watching him. Whatever of anger might have been in his face when forward left it as he approached the mate and the officer. He smiled sweetly, but it was an incongruous, out-of-place sort of smile, considering his other adornments. His bald head was covered with tar, as though he had been crowned with an inverted and full-charged tar-bucket, and black, sticky rivulets ran down his cheeks and under his shirt collar. His nose was swollen and bleeding. He worked his lips and spat continually from the intrusion of some grease into his mouth, and there was a perceptible limp to his businesslike stride which spoke of recent contact with something hard and swift.

Mr. Becker scowled as he halted before them, but the officer smiled encouragingly, and said: "You are Mr. Sinful Peck, I hear."

"Yes, sir; that's the name I'm known by aboard this hell-ship. Mr. Becker," he said to the mate, "will you permit me to speak to this gentleman in your august presence?"

The scowling Mr. Becker made no answer, and Sinful continued: "You are a Government officer, sir?"

"Lieutenant Seward, Sixth Artillery—attached to the Customs."

"I am ex-first mate of this ship. Here is my successor and predecessor, who forgets that I am ex-officio entitled to consideration, and has thrown me to the dogs. I cannot write a letter, as I have no stationery, and know better than to ask for it; but will you kindly inform Captain Jackson of my predicament, sir, when you see him?"

"Most certainly—when he is in condition to hear of it; but I am informed that he is very low—too low to be disturbed."

"Of course—of course, Lieutenant. Only when he is in condition to attend to the matter. I can drag my chain until then, I hope, but in case I fail—what is the penalty for murder under martial law? I am a student of civil and international law, but not of martial. I am a pearl cast before swine. What will happen if I kill a pig or a bucko mate?"

"You will be shot," answered the officer with a smile.

"Thank you, sir. I shall remember. Mr. Becker," he said to the mate, "have no fear of me. You are a poor, ignorant man, and you knew no better. I shall not kill you until we get to America."

"Well, I want none o' yer lip," declared Mr. Becker angrily, advancing toward him.

"Steady as you go, sir," answered Sinful, backing away, with hands uplifted. "If you touch me you'll get mussed; and you look fine in that clean shirt, Mr. Becker; you ought to wear a clean shirt every day, sir."

"I needn't touch you, ——you," snarled the exasperated officer, springing to the rail and extracting a belaying-pin.

"Wait," said the Lieutenant, blocking his way. "You are not going to assault that man for good-humored joking."

"I'll break his head," sputtered Mr. Becker. But he halted.

"You will not be permitted. Manila is under martial law, which is quick and severe. Men," he said to the two privates, who had remained near the gangway, "your duty will be not only to see that no contraband goods are smuggled out of this ship, but that there is no assault of seamen by officers. If an officer strikes a man except in self-defense put him under arrest and notify me."

"Yes, sir," they answered, saluting, and looking hard at Mr. Becker, who put the belaying-pin back and faced Mr. Seward in a white heat.

"Yes—that's all right, for the army or the navy," he said, "with the power o' the Government behind you; but how'll a man manage aboard these ships with the crews we get? Here's Mr. Brown here"—the second mate had just come out of the cabin door—"an' me, all alone wi' twenty-five men to handle an' keep at work—every man of 'em ready to mutiny at any time. Look at 'em forrard, there!" he stormily continued; "that baker's dozen by the galley door. See that big tough with the cro'-jack eye? That's Big Pig Monahan, the ringleader o' the lot. See that hang-dog mug beside him? That's Seldom Helward, ready for murder at any time. What d'ye think o' men wi' them names! Think them men'll listen to reason?"

"Mr. Becker is right, Lieutenant," said Sinful. "Their names alone condemn them. There are Poop-Deck Cahill, and Turkey Twain, Ghost O'Brien, Gunner Meagher—it would pain you to hear them all, sir. They are town-mates of mine, to my shame and confusion; but Mr. Becker is right; they will not listen to reason. They are dock-rats and river thieves from Cleveland."

"An' you're the worst thief among 'em, I'll bet," growled the mate.

"Thank you, sir," answered Sinful, straightening up, a ridiculous figure of mock dignity; "but I cannot argue that with you. I am come aft for relief from the medicine-chest. While saving your leg from amputation I learned of its contents. There is croton oil there, which will assuage the pain in my own leg, where a splinter of bone has been kicked off by a sea boot. May I have the croton oil, sir?"

A little of shame and embarrassment came to the angry face of the mate, and when he observed the questioning gaze of the Lieutenant fixed upon him he said gruffly: "Go ahead."

Sinful limped into the cabin, and in a few minutes returned with a large, flat bottle. He nodded a cheery "good-morning" to the Lieutenant, and was about to pass forward when he saw the "baker's dozen" of men leave their place near the galley, and march aft in a body. There was purpose in their rugged, intelligent faces, though but little index of the turpitude credited them by Sinful and the mate, and they approached as though they had something to say, or do. Sinful halted, and then edged over toward the two soldiers.

"Mr. Becker," said the big "ringleader" respectfully, "it isn't quite one bell yet. May we speak to this officer 'fore we turn to?"

The mate nodded a surly consent and the man turned to the Lieutenant.

"My name's Monahan, sir——"

"Big Pig Monahan," interrupted Sinful.

"Big Pig it is, my son, but don't interrupt. Can you tell us, sir, if the banks ashore are doing business with the home banks now?"

"No," said the Lieutenant. "There's a military government in force, and all foreign business is at a standstill."

"No way, then, sir, by which we can draw money on our home banks? This crowd could bunch issues and buy a fleet of ships like this, but we're helpless, unless we can communicate with our bankers in Cleveland. We merely want our discharge from this ship and can pay for it. But we've signed articles and the skipper refused liberty yesterday. Now he's in the hospital. We want to go home by steamer, not 'fore the mast in a sailing ship. Would an appeal to the Admiral be of use, sir?"

"Decidedly, no. If you signed articles he would not interfere without the Captain's knowledge and consent. And he is too near death to be troubled. No one can discharge you except your Captain, when he recovers—that is, unless you have cause for complaint worthy of the Provost Court's attention. Have you any grievances?"

BIG PIG MONAHAN STOOD BEHIND HIM ON THE HATCH

"None this side of Singapore, sir—now that the nigger is dead, and we have this little devil 'fore the mast with us. The two mates have just joined, and haven't shown their teeth yet. If they begin, how shall we get a complaint ashore, sir?"

"They will not begin. These two men whom I will leave here will prevent it."

"There'll be no trouble of our starting; we want to keep clean records. But there'll be no way of our knowing just when the skipper can listen to our proposition. Will you be kind enough to put it to him, sir, whenever he gets well enough? Say that we'll make good the pay of thirteen new men for the run home, and that we don't want any money from him—only our discharges. Our interests at home are suffering."

"Do you think he will believe that you can do it?"

"He can make sure by cabling, sir. We had no money for that at Singapore, and we can't get ashore here, and are just as poor. But at home I'm a shipowner and master, while there are several here wealthier than I."

"If you are wealthy men," asked the officer, looking at the innocent though dirty face of Sinful, "how do you happen to be here? This man gives you a different standing."

"They're not wealthy, Lieutenant," said Sinful earnestly. "They know every free lunch in Cleveland, but they can't even buy drinks."

"This man," said Big Pig hotly, "is a liar. He made a fool bet a few years back on Bryan's election—which was to make a deep-water voyage if he lost. He made the bet with Seldom—Captain Helward at home—and we all came down to New York to see him off. Just 'fore going aboard he gave us a parting wine supper, drugged us all, and had us shanghaied by the crimp that shipped him."

Mr. Seward laughed and said: "Well, I am to tell the Captain, for Sinful, that he is disrated, and I will also state your proposition as soon as possible. There are plenty of men in port, and I see no reason why he should hold you. But you cannot land in Manila unless in perfect health. The quarantine is very strict, and the slightest symptom of contagious disease will bar you out."

"We're all right, sir," they exclaimed noisily.

One bell tinkled from the cabin clock, and the mate growled: "Turn to and take off the main hatch so that this Inspector o' Customs an' sailors' dry-nurse can look into the hold. I'll get the ship's papers."

The Lieutenant's face flushed as he looked at the retreating figure of the mate, and he said to the two soldiers: "Watch that man carefully, and bring him ashore if he gives you the slightest excuse."

"Yes, sir," answered one, "we will; but how about the men? They seem to be abusing that little fellow."

"The men," said the officer in a musing tone. "Their case is beyond my interference; and the little fellow seems able to take care of himself. But don't let them kill him."

"Something doing now, sir," said the other soldier, looking forward, and the Lieutenant followed his glance. Most of the crew—not yet set at work—were watching Mr. Brown and Sinful Peck, who were holding a heated argument near the windlass. Sinful held in one hand a "slush-bucket," from which with the other hand he had scooped some grease and plastered the tar on his bald head, his object, of course, being the softening of the tar for easy removal. But he was doing it in working hours, and Mr. Brown, who had not heard the Lieutenant's orders forbidding assault, was very properly incensed. Sinful's voice of protest could not be heard plainly, but Mr. Brown's was loud, profane and emphatic, the burden of his criticism, however, referring as much to Sinful's handiness with a gun as to his bad manners in making his toilette after one bell. As they looked, the second mate's fist shot out and the little man went down; then Mr. Brown began kicking the small victim in the ribs, methodically and rhythmically.

"Stop that!" roared the Lieutenant, starting forward. "Arrest that man," he called back to the two privates, and they followed, shipping their bayonets as they ran. Mr. Brown was interrupted by two sharp steel points pressing his sides; then, as he started back, the rifles were crossed between him and his victim.

"Take him over the side and send him ashore to the Provost Marshal General," said Mr. Seward sternly.

"What's this for?" asked the astonished second mate. "Why—why—he shot me—shot me with my own pistol."

"He must have been a poor marksman to hit your leg. Over the side with him, men." And Mr. Brown, expostulating loudly as he went, was marched aft to the main rigging and compelled to climb down to the waiting cascoe.

Sinful scrambled painfully to his feet, and with his nose bleeding afresh, limped after the Lieutenant and asked:

"Can you take me along as prosecuting witness, sir?"

"Not needed in a Provost Court. I am witness enough," said the Lieutenant without halting; and Sinful returned to his toilette. This time he was permitted to finish, even to bandaging his leg.

The Lieutenant reached the gangway and met Mr. Becker with the ship's papers. He examined the papers, peeped down the opened hatches at the ballast in the lower hold, and then, handing back the papers to the mate, turned to the gangway, but halted at the steps and called back:

"I am taking the second mate ashore under arrest for assaulting one of the sailors. If you duplicate his offense you will receive as summary treatment. Men," he said to the soldiers, "you are to see to this."

Then he went over the side, and the soldiers explained what had happened. Mr. Becker climbed to the poop, peered down at his brother officer seated disconsolately on a box surrounded by soldiers, and at the Lieutenant under the awning of the steam launch, which was now making fast to the cascoe; then, mopping his hairy face with his coat sleeve, he came down and looked blankly at the soldiers.

"Well, I'll be hanged," he said. "What am I to do now—alone here with this crew o' men."

"Try treating them decently," answered one. "Such work would spoil the best company in the army. You heard our orders? Well, we'll carry them out."

Mr. Becker did not answer. And whether he was more oppressed by his isolation among unfriendly men or by the menace of martial law could not be surmised by his new attitude toward the crew; for he became a model merchant officer, quiet, dignified and civil-spoken, and on that afternoon kept them at light, easy tasks, calculated to win the regard of the most mutinous of sailors. Even was he kind to Sinful Peck, which so emboldened the little man that when work was done for the day he came aft and requested—the ship being in port—free access to the fresh-water tanks for the men he had been thrown among.

"Guess yer talkin' for yerself more'n them, aren't you?" said the mate.

"For myself entirely, sir," answered Sinful. "The weather is warm and the forecastle poorly ventilated. Some are complaining of prickly heat, and it may be the itch. Perhaps they would wash if the example were set."

"You need a bath yerself. Go ahead and set the example."

Salt slush, though an excellent solvent for sticky tar, is not a cosmetic of the first order, and Sinful's appearance really attested his own urgent need of what he prescribed for the others. The mate ordered the carpenter to unlock the deck tanks and sent a case of soap forward by the steward—a benefaction so unprecedented that the men openly debited their shares on the slop-chest account. But the gift was acceptable, and for half an hour in the gathering darkness the forward deck was a natatorium. Then it became a laundry, and until far into the night men washed, rinsed and hung up shirts and underwear to dry in the rigging.

But the soldier on watch noticed that Sinful Peck was the only one of the fourteen men from Cleveland who washed clothes. The others had gone below after their bath, and when he called his comrade at midnight to relieve him he reported that Sinful was still at it.

The sleepy soldier strolled forward. Sinful was sitting on the forehatch beside a large pile of damp clothes, with a bucket between his knees, industriously washing away. Big Pig Monahan stood behind him on the hatch, twirling in his hand a piece of rope, and as the soldier drew near he said:

"It pains me, my son, to rope's-end you; but you've got to finish the crowd's wash, and we're giving you three nights to do it. By the time you've rinsed out that pile it'll be two bells, and you can turn in; and to-morrow night you go on with more, but every man on anchor watch gets this rope with instructions to use it if you shirk. Now I'll call Seldom. You'd better not monkey with him."

Big Pig entered the forecastle, and the soldier said to Sinful: "This seems to be compulsory; but we're ordered not to interfere between you men. I can't help you."

"Compulsory?" answered Sinful, peering up into the soldier's face with a ghastly smile on his own. "Not at all. It's a labor of love—and self-protection. It's painful to watch them scratch, and I'd hate to catch the itch. They call it prickly heat, but it's the itch. They caught it loafing 'round Singapore. It's contagious, and they can't be discharged with a contagious disease. And as they're too lazy to wash their clothes, I'm doing it for them."

"Guess you wouldn't be sorry to see 'em discharged," laughed the soldier.

"Oh, yes, I would. I love 'em, bad as they are; but I hate to see them down with the itch."

He wrung out the last garment and dumped the bucket on deck; then he began filling a large tub with rinsing water, and the soldier went aft.

In the morning Mr. Becker, not caring to hoist over one of the ship's boats with a disaffected crew aboard, hailed the passing dingey of another ship and went ashore. He returned at noon with business in his face, and when he sang out "Turn to" at one bell, as cleanly a crew as ever manned a rope answered the call and, at his behest, began rigging cargo whips. Ballast was to be discharged, he informed the bosuns, and a cargo of sugar and hemp taken in for Shanghai. The Captain, on his sick bed, had arranged the charter, and as it would take a month to load he hoped to be well in time to sail.

Scant comfort for the homesick and well-doing men. Mr. Becker was not their ambassador; neither had he brought word from Mr. Seward. And to add to their troubles, something seemed to be the matter with them. Three came aft at nightfall and asked the steward for saleratus, as a remedy for prickly heat. The steward obliged them with a small package, but at breakfast time next morning, when seven others came aft with the same request, he was obliged to refuse. He had none to spare, and suggested that they eat less and drink less water in such a hot climate. The refusal was not of great moment, as the first three complained that it had not relieved the itching and burning sensation which afflicted them from head to foot; but at noon, when the whole thirteen came aft and bared their chests to the mate, exposing an angry red rash, and officially appealed to him for relief from the medicine-chest, the matter looked serious. They were in torment, they said, and thirteen men in torment is a serious proposition on board ship. Mr. Becker disclaimed knowledge of medicine-chests, and sent for Sinful Peck. The little man, clean and sweet and smiling, came aft and prescribed flower of sulphur, applied dry.

"For it's nothing but the itch," he said, "which they must have contracted while sleeping in the dog-kennels at Singapore. Yes, I'll stake my professional reputation that it is the itch."

There being none to contradict a man with a professional reputation, the sulphur was taken forward and applied; and their heavy breathing and suppressed groans half an hour later as the irritant ate into their several skins brought encouraging words from Sinful and a fraternal pity to his face.

"It's only because it's taking hold, boys," he said to them. "It'll be all right by supper-time. You've been pretty severe on me, but I tell you I'm sorry for you."

"Sorry, you little devil!" said Seldom Helward. "I believe you've made it worse." But Sinful earnestly maintained the correctness of his diagnosis.

They turned to at one bell and worked for an hour; then they mutinously quit their tasks, stripped, and washed off the sulphur. A change of underwear followed, and for a while they felt better; but at supper-time the itching and burning had returned. They were not polite in their remarks to Sinful, and that evening he had twenty-six socks and twenty-six pieces of underwear added to his wash-list. Smiling cheerfully in the darkness he set to work.

In the morning the soldiers on guard would have reported the matter to the Health Officer ashore, but as they were able to work, and the disease showed no signs of spreading, Mr. Becker, with the assistance of Sinful, overruled them.

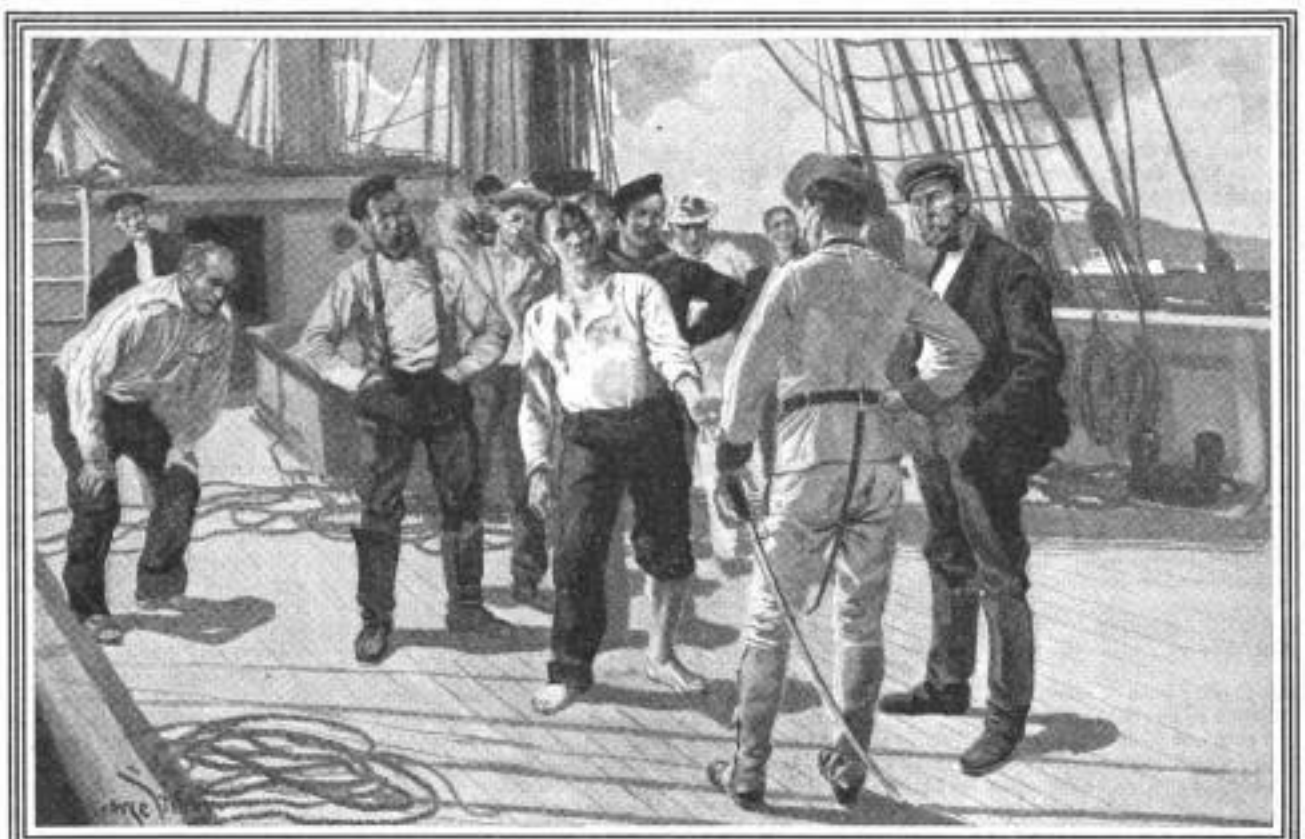
So, while the miserable days of waiting for the Captain's recovery and their prospective release wore along, they were kept at light tasks about the deck, the heavier cargo work being done by natives from ashore. Sinful advised the suffering men not to bathe so frequently, as water was bad for the itch, or any cutaneous affection; but, finding invariably a temporary relief after a bath and change of clothing, and ascribing his suggestion to an interested motive, they continued the practice, and kept him busy each night at the washtub.

The nightly labor and loss of sleep may have told upon his self-control. He came aft one morning when the ship was loaded, and showed his hands and wrists to the mate and the soldier on guard. He angrily demanded to be taken out of the forecastle; he had caught the contagion from fools who would not follow his advice. And he had not shipped to work on deck all day for the owners and half the night as wash-woman for the crew.

He was too insolent, and Mr. Becker promptly knocked him down; but the next moment the mate felt the prick of the soldier's bayonet.

"Just what I've been waiting for, you inhuman brute," said the soldier. "Now you'll go ashore under arrest, and we'll have medical relief for these men."

The mate paled, but said nothing; and as the disfigured Sinful crept forward, the soldier roused his comrade, hailed a passing Government steam launch, and had Mr. Becker into it before the men forward knew what had happened.



But in the middle of the afternoon Mr. Becker came back in the same steam launch that had originally brought the Inspector of Customs, and with him were not only Mr. Brown, but a gaunt, hollow-eyed spectre whom the crew with difficulty recognized as Captain Jackson, master of the ship, and also a uniformed officer with the insignia of a surgeon on his collar. They helped the Captain up the gangway and seated him in a deck-chair; then Mr. Becker called for Sinful Peck to come aft. Sinful came.

"I didn't know you were disrated, Peck," said the Captain weakly. "I had a relapse after I chartered the ship, and Lieutenant Seward, whom you depended upon to tell me, was sent inland. He has just returned. Mr. Becker and Mr. Brown are fined a good portion of their pay by the Provost Court, and I hope there will be no more trouble. Get your dunnage into the third mate's room, and send your thirteen friends aft to me."

"Thank you, sir," said Sinful with his sweetest smile, and went forward. Then came the thirteen sufferers and stood before the Captain.

"I am a very sick man," said he; "too sick to care for any more trouble with my crew for a while. I have cleared for Shanghai, and there is nothing to settle but your case. The mate informs me that you have behaved well, are anxious to be discharged, and are willing to pay for it. I would not take your money, and as there are plenty of men ashore, will discharge you if the Health Officer will permit. But I hear you are down with some contagion."

They showed him their breasts and arms, and the surgeon drew near.

"THEY'RE NOT WEALTHY, LIEUTENANT," SAID SINFUL EARNESTLY

"Don't know what it is, Capt'n," said Big Pig, "unless it's prickly heat. That isn't contagious."

"Peck swears it's the itch," said the mate, who had joined the group.

"It is not that," said the surgeon. "We are all too familiar with that ashore to fear it, or to bar it out as a contagion. I don't know what it is. Such an aggravated rash, so similar on so many men, never came into my experience."

"But it is contagious, sir," said Sinful—who had returned—dropping his dunnage to the deck and displaying his inflamed wrists.

"They've made me wash their clothes for a month, and this morning I found this eruption."

"They cannot land, Captain," said the surgeon. "The rules are very strict, with so many unacclimated soldiers on the island. You must take them to sea."

"Very well. You hear, men? You must make the best of it, and"—he sank back with a sigh—"so must I."

With desperation in their woebegone faces they slowly moved forward.

Next day as the ship was passing Cavite on the way out to sea, Captain Jackson called his newly-installed third mate up to him.

"Mr. Peck," he said, "you are a shrewd man and a physician. What is the matter with those men?"

Sinful looked him gravely in the face.

"They'll murder me, Captain, if they ever find out; but it's nothing that water and soap won't remedy. Let them wash their own clothes and rinse them well. As long as they made me wash them I dosed the rinsing water with croton oil."

Carlyle and Cheyne Row—By W. S. Harwood

IT IS quite like wandering through a gallery of ghosts—great ghosts, some of them—to stroll through the roomy old building at No. 24 Cheyne Row, Chelsea, London. There are no greater names in the calendar of the century than the names of those who, either in person or through affectionate remembrances of one kind and another, have been represented in this building, for forty-seven years the home of Thomas Carlyle.

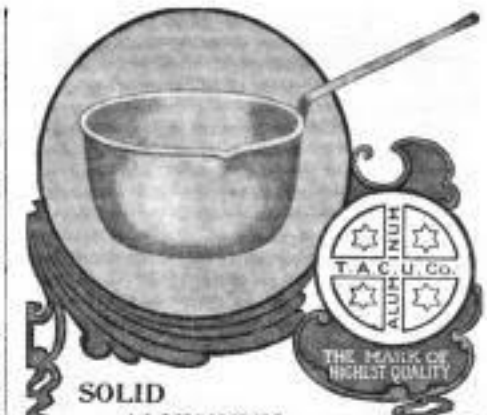
But there are other bodies, not so like the shades of the past, which frequent the place now. For example, I examined the register of the house where visitors write their names if they feel so inclined, and I found that during the month of August, 1899, about three hundred people had worshiped at the shrine of the Sage of Chelsea. Naturally, an American would be interested in knowing how many of these visitors were from his own country. The register disclosed the fact that one hundred and forty-two Americans visited the house in that month as against ninety-nine Englishmen. And the ruddy-cheeked caretaker goes so far as to say that, but for the Americans, the place would fare ill. They come to visit the home of Carlyle in large numbers, they buy liberally of catalogues and the special editions of some of his works on sale; and, more than that, they contribute liberally by money payments to the maintenance of the house.

CARLYLE'S HOME IN CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA, SHOWING MARBLE MEDALLION IN WALL

Indeed, from the time the first movement was made to preserve this historic place, Americans, either in London or at home, took an important part. The resident American Ambassador is always a member of the Carlyle's House Memorial Trust; Mr. Wm. H. Forbes, of Boston, is also a member; Mr. Poultney Bigelow headed the first Executive Committee appointed to take steps toward the establishment of a fund for the purchase of the house, upon which committee was also Mr. George W. Smalley, the well-known correspondent. Mr. Samuel Elliott, of New York City, took an important part in the organization of the American Committee of which Bishop Henry C. Potter was chairman, Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan treasurer, Mr. Phillips Smalley secretary, and Mr. Elliot chairman of the Executive Committee. Later, the Executive Committee in charge of the raising of American funds for the purchase consisted of Professor Charles Eliot Norton, of Harvard University, Mr. Horace Russell, Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie, and Mr. Elliott.

So it has come about that Americans have had no inferior part in preserving this memorial of one of the gigantic figures of the century.

Along the Thames Embankment, near the Carlyle house, lies a little park known as the Chelsea Embankment Gardens. Here where Carlyle loved to wander in his sad and sombre way a statue has been placed, done by the German sculptor Boehm, I believe.



When this statue was dedicated, October 26, 1882, but a year after Carlyle's death, Mr. John Tyndall closed the oration pronounced upon the occasion with some words having a particular American interest:

"It now becomes my duty," he said, "to unveil and present to the British public and to the strangers within our gates who can appreciate greatness, the statue of a great man. Might I append to these brief remarks the expression of a wish, personal, perhaps, in its warmth but more than personal in its aim, that somewhere upon this Thames Embankment could be raised a companion memorial to a man who loved a hero and was by him beloved to the end. I refer to the loftiest, purest and most penetrating spirit that has ever shone in American literature, to Ralph Waldo Emerson."

The house where Carlyle passed the greater portion of his literary life has many articles of interest and pictures without number. Speaking of pictures, it is a curious fact, as I demonstrated by enumeration, that a man so violent in all opposition to sham and to what we are wont to call pose, should have had thirty-three different photographs taken of himself, to say nothing of sketches and paintings.

The room which Emerson occupied while visiting Carlyle is now the home of the caretaker of the building, a bright, cheery room facing on Cheyne Row. Down in the basement kitchen is the great range in front of which Tennyson and Carlyle, so the story goes, were in the habit of settling great problems of the race between long whiffs at their pipes. The drawing-room, where Carlyle solved the last mystery of his strangely mysterious life, naturally is one of the most interesting rooms in the house. His attic study, too, is specially interesting, where he built himself a room which was, so he hoped, to be free from the irritating noises of London; "a top story," as he wrote to his sister in 1853, "one big apartment twenty feet square, ... into which no sound can come; and all the cocks in Nature may crow around it without my hearing whisper of them."

Carlyle and his wife began their life in this building in 1834, not intending it should be their permanent home; but neither one left it for good until it was time for the kirkyard.

MARSHALL FIELD

By Forrest Crissey

A CHARACTER STUDY OF THE GREAT CHICAGO MERCHANT —HIS BUSINESS PRINCIPLES AND HIS PERSONAL HABITS

MARSHALL FIELD is the most guessed-at, the least understood of all the commanding figures now dominating American commercial life. More than this, he is the world's greatest merchant—at least in the technical and restricted sense of the term.

Just now Chicago is looking for large things from Mr. Field, in the shape of a home and an endowment for the greatest museum of natural history in the world.

What will be the proportions of Mr. Field's gift, provided all obstacles to its location on the site especially pleasing to the great merchant are at once removed, is not known even to his most intimate associates. This is thoroughly characteristic of the man. To an extent seldom practiced he "keeps his own key and counsel." He feels that it is enough to say that if an acceptable location on the Lake Front is provided he will build and endow the kind of museum with which he would like his name to be associated in the minds of future Chicagoans. And the Chicagoans of the present are quite willing to take this statement at its greatest possible meaning, because it is made by Marshall Field.

This is very largely because Mr. Field is neither an amateur nor a professional philanthropist. He does not play at being beneficent, nor does he make a business of it. Above all things Mr. Field despises sham and pretense. He does not pretend to interests which he does not feel and he detests anything that resembles posing.

Perhaps it is because he pretends to so little in the line of public philanthropy and gives so much on the plain basis of business that Chicago is ready to accept his simple assurance in so important a matter as the future of the museum without the naming of any definite sum.

His Work His Monument

The solidity, the dignity and the rectitude of the man as they are recognized by his fellow-townsmen are Mr. Field's real monument. He has given to the business of merchandizing a standard that will more effectively commemorate his character than any museum possibly can.

This does not imply that Mr. Field is beloved by the people generally of Chicago. He is not—perhaps because he is in person comparatively a stranger to the mass of them and has never assumed to be devoted to public affairs. He has attended strictly to his own business and has asked nothing more of his fellow-citizens than to be allowed this unobtrusive privilege. But in the place of that sentiment which an ambitious man who is either great or clever sometimes wins from the community, Marshall Field has inspired a universal respect and admiration that even his frank exclusiveness and his reserve cannot chill.

Why has he not mingled more in general society and in public affairs? The answer is a very simple one: He dislikes publicity for himself, and prefers a simple, quiet life. He has also been too busy. This sounds very selfish; but a just view of the situation does not make Mr. Field's personal neglect of these matters appear more selfish than the conduct of many men of great wealth who have contrived incidentally to cut a large figure in public affairs. When his fortune was in the making—and his life-habits, too—the weight of responsibilities and the burden of executive details which demanded his personal attention were so great and so exacting that he had not a moment for anything beyond the "fierce race for wealth." Not that he kept his eye upon this goal or "set his stake" at so many millions, but he was deep in the great game of commerce and of fortune-building; others were depending upon him, more than he upon them; he had undertaken and must fulfill. And before he was able to look up from his desk and feel that he had time to spare for anything that he chose, his hair had whitened and the power to choose anything but the great game of affairs had gone with the years of his young and his middle manhood. The private duty nearest at hand had been admirably fulfilled; there had not been time for more, and now he is sixty-eight years old and still actively in the harness!

Few things annoy Mr. Field more than newspaper guesses upon the size of his fortune or of his holdings in certain lines of investment. On this point it is sufficient to say that his fortune is among the largest in America—probably there are not a half-dozen wealthier individuals in this country. As a merchant only he does an annual business of more than sixty million dollars; the general public never thinks of him as a railroad man, and yet he is one of the heaviest owners of railroad securities in the United States; his mining and manufacturing interests are little short of colossal; he is a powerful factor in several large banking and financial institutions; he is one of the most extensive owners of Chicago "downtown" real estate; he is the controlling spirit of the great Pullman Company.

His Puritan Instincts and Ideals

Speculation, even of the most conservative kind, has been entirely barred from his methods, and his wealth does not represent corresponding losses on the part of others. All that he has done in the building of his own fortune has been so much solid constructive work for the material interests of his community and of commerce in general. Conservatism, industry, application, clean methods and high commercial standards all stand out in Mr. Field's life in so conspicuous a degree that the pulpit might well look to his life for an object-lesson with which to illuminate any of the elemental human virtues, but usually it has inclined to go for this purpose to the careers of men of more magnetic temperament and of larger profession.

Those of Marshall Field's early friends who have faced financial difficulties in later years and those who belong to the elect group having familiar entrance to his home are the only ones who know the warmth of humanity hid behind his cold, polished exterior. His powerful help has always been at the command of his old friends; it has often turned disaster into triumph for them and put generous fortunes into their hands. His loyalty to the men for whom he formed an early fondness is clearly a pronounced characteristic. Not many of them are now living, but such of them as remain may be found at the round table in the dining-room of the Chicago Club, where Mr. Field takes his luncheon. Though he is simple and democratic—scrupulously and conscientiously so!—he does not especially invite intimacy nor cultivate the social acquaintance of young men, but few men of large affairs keep closer watch on the young men who are doing things than he. He prefers the company of the old and seasoned friends whose discretion he can trust, and with whom he can speak without restraint. With them he is social and genial, and they uniformly speak of him as modest, unassuming and fair-minded, with a keen sense of justice, a firm belief in doing right because it is right, and a distinct inclination to have his individual purposes and objects square with the interests of the community.

His Puritan blood and principles show in the general poise and rectitude of his character, but especially in the repressions to which he subjects himself. The typical English squire or the Blue-Grass planter does not like a fine horse better than Mr. Field, and he has been known to confess that if his New England blood did not rise in spleen against the unsavory associations of the turf he might have maintained a stable of the highest standard.

Though Mr. Field has an instinctive and pronounced dread of the newspaper reporter, and seldom yields to the importunities of the interviewer, there are few subjects about which he displays as much curiosity as the modern newspaper and its management. Those who understand the fascination which the newspaper has for the great merchant are inclined to think that along with a stable of thoroughbred horses Mr. Field has also sacrificed to his Puritan ideals and instincts the pleasure of owning a great metropolitan newspaper.

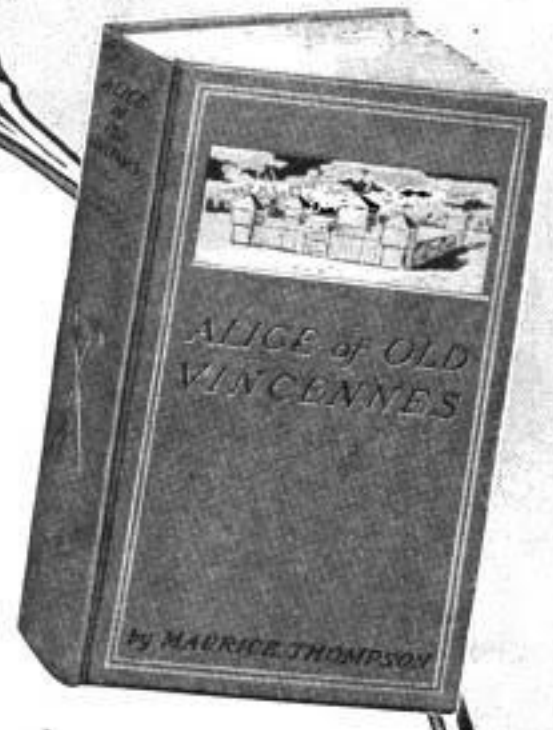
Four Recent Popular Novels

Without Cost

To the readers of

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

To introduce THE SATURDAY EVENING POST to those who are not already readers, we will send the magazine each week for the entire balance of the year 1903 for $1.00. The regular subscription price of THE POST is $2.00 the year.



To any person who will send us one such order from some one who is not now a subscriber we will send, shipping expenses prepaid, any one of these four books.

Remember, the subscription must not be your own and it must not already be on our list. The book must be requested when the order is forwarded; otherwise it cannot be sent.

We make this book offer to our readers in acknowledgment of their courtesy in introducing THE SATURDAY EVENING POST through this special offer to those who are not already subscribers and who may only buy an occasional copy.

These books are all high-grade, popular works of fiction of which many thousands have been sold within the past few months. They are bound in cloth and finely illustrated. With one exception, the publisher's price of each book is $1.50.

The Curtis Publishing Company
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Misdemeanors of Nancy

by Eleanor Hoyt

In all fiction it would be hard to find a more fascinating, charmingly frivolous little flirt than this irresistible creation of Miss Hoyt's.

It is one of the daintiest, cleverest books published for many a day. No reader can fail to close it without a mingled feeling of regret at thus leaving the heroine and of envy for "the man who came often."

The sixteen full-page illustrations by Penryn Stanlaws are as dainty and charming as the heroine.

Bylow Hill

by George W. Cable

One of the most dramatically interesting novels published during the past year.

In the midst of an elm-shaded New England town Mr. Cable has set a story which for thrilling interest has seldom been surpassed.

While dramatic and forceful, it is presented with all that delicacy and refinement which have made this author's stories a delight to lovers of the best in American literature. The six full-page illustrations by F. C. Yohn are beautiful pieces of color work.

Alice of Old Vincennes

by Maurice Thompson

In this, his best story, Mr. Thompson has reached the high tide of historical novel writing. The action takes place in and around Vincennes, Indiana, when that town was a French settlement.

It is a delightful story of love and patriotism, and justly deserves the instant popularity with which it was received and the phenomenal sale which it is enjoying. The numerous full-page illustrations by F. C. Yohn are delicately printed on a tinted background, which adds greatly to the artistic appearance of the book.

The Lion and The Unicorn

by Richard Harding Davis

Collected in this dainty volume are four of the most charming short stories which have come from the versatile pen of Richard Harding Davis. All are told in that delightfully clever way which has so won the hearts of the readers of Mr. Davis's stories. "The Lion and The Unicorn" gives the title to the collection. "The Fever Ship," a powerfully written story of the Cuban war; "The Vagrant," a charming love tale of the West Indies, and "The Man with One Talent," another clever story of the Cuban war, make up the balance of the collection.

"HIS HAND WAS LIKE A STEAM ENGINE"

IF WE could only find the Missing Link," said the Professor, "there would be an end to all doubt as to the theory of development. My own idea is that some day he will be found."

"Wasn't there an expedition in search of the Missing Link a few years ago?" asked young Horton. "If I remember rightly, the expedition went to Borneo, or some such place, and never returned."

"Precisely so," replied the Professor. "I fancy that the whole affair was grossly mismanaged, for the man at the head of the expedition was certainly not the man for the place."

We were sitting in the smoking-room of a hotel at Dover—a company of weather-bound travelers, waiting for the storm to abate sufficiently to permit the Calais steamer to leave the shelter of the breakwater. There were perhaps a dozen of us all told, but the Professor, as we called him, rather monopolized the conversation, which for some time had been devoted to the Darwinian theory.

Suddenly an American, who had something of the look of the merchant sailor about him, took his cigar from his mouth and remarked: "Finding the Missing Link is all right. But having the Link find you mightn't be altogether satisfactory."

"I do not quite understand you," said the Professor rather stiffly.

"Oh, I ain't giving out any conundrums. I said that having the Link find you might not suit you all the way down to the ground. I'm speaking, sir, from experience, for I was once found by that identical Missing Link that you are so anxious to see, and the experience was a mighty curious one. If you want to hear it I'll give you the yarn."

Several of us replied that we should be glad to hear the sailor's story, and without any further delay he launched into it.

"About six years ago I was at Singapore, and I don't mind saying that I was on the beach—if you know what that means. I had shipped as A. B. aboard a big, four-masted ship out of Newcastle, bound to Shanghai, and I got disgusted with the grub and the way in which I and the rest of the men were treated. So when we put into Singapore for water I deserted, and kept shady till the ship had sailed. I found out afterward that I should have done better if I had stuck to the ship, for after waiting pretty near five weeks in Singapore, and not being able to get a ship, I was kicked out by the boarding-house keeper, and had to sleep in the open and live on food that I could beg from the natives.

"Well, one day there came to Singapore a scientific chap by the name of Butler, and my idea is that he was the identical chap that the Professor was speaking of just now. He was going into the interior to hunt for a new style of monkey that he called the Missing Link, and he was glad to find a white man who would join him. I needn't say that I was glad to go with him, for it meant food, and the half of a tent and twenty dollars a month to me. I was the only white man in the expedition besides Butler. We had three Malays with us, who were to carry our provisions and things, and act as a sort of guard, and the five of us calculated to travel across the peninsula, heading in a northwesterly direction, and coming out on the opposite coast.

"We started in good spirits, but I'm free to say that if any man who knew anything about expeditions in the jungle had seen us, and expressed his opinion, he would have said that we were a set of—well, everlasting fools! We were armed all right, for every man had a rifle, and Butler had a spare shotgun besides. And we had plenty of ammunition—about enough, as I judged, to supply a small army for a six months' campaign. But in the matter of food we were on short rations from the first. Butler calculated that we should find all the game we wanted. We didn't take any water except about a pint for each man in a water-bottle, and there was only a pint of brandy, Butler being a teetotaler.

"We had bad luck from the very first. The jungle was that thick that you couldn't force your way through it, except with an ax, and we didn't see much game, but we managed to get enough to keep us from starving, though as a general thing we were pretty hungry. About the tenth day, as near as I could reckon, one of the Malays was gathered in by a tiger. Three days later the two other Malays bolted in the night, taking their rifles with them. This left Butler and me alone, but he wasn't a bit discouraged. We filled our pockets with cartridges, and left the rest of our outfit behind us. We marched along pretty steady during the morning and evening, but we had to halt during the middle of the day on account of the heat. We couldn't make a fire, except once in a long while, for we had brought but a few boxes of matches, and we couldn't afford to run through them. Of course, we had to take watch and watch at night, but with the exception of the tiger that carried off the Malay, hardly any animal came near us. I suppose the jungle was too thick to be a handy place for big game, but it suited the small fellows and the snakes. I never saw such a place for snakes of all sizes and colors, but Butler said most of them were harmless.

"We'd been marching through that jungle for more than a fortnight when Butler was bitten by a harmless snake and died in six hours. He was a brave man, and he died as coolly as if he was going to sleep. There was nothing I could do for him, for we hadn't any medicine for snake bites, and if he had been loaded down with it I don't believe it could have saved him. I got him to take some brandy, but he wouldn't take enough to do him any real good. He talked sensibly with me, though he was suffering a lot of pain. He told me to take his compass and steer northeast till I came to the coast, where

MEAL TIME DRINKS

Should be Selected to Suit the Health as Well as the Taste

When the coffee toper, ill from coffee drinking, finally leaves off coffee the battle is only half won. Most people require some hot drink at meal time and they also need the rebuilding agent to build up what coffee has destroyed. Postum is the rebuilder, the other half of the battle.

Some people stop coffee and drink hot water, but find this a thin, unpalatable diet, with no rebuilding properties. It is much easier to break away from coffee by serving strong, hot, well boiled Postum in its place. A prominent wholesale grocer of Faribault, Minn., says: "For a long time I was nervous and could not digest my food. I went to a doctor who prescribed a tonic and told me to leave off coffee and drink hot water.

"I did so for a time and got some relief, but did not get entirely well, so I lost patience and said: 'Oh, well, coffee isn't the cause of my troubles,' and went back to drinking it. I became worse than ever. Then Postum was prescribed. It was not made right at first and for two mornings I could hardly drink it.

"Then I had it boiled full fifteen minutes and used good cream, and I had a most charming beverage.

"I fairly got fat on the food drink and my friends asked me what had happened, I was so well. I was set right permanently when Postum was made right.

"I know other men here who use Postum, among others the Cashier of the Security Bank and a well-known clergyman.

"My firm sells a lot of Postum, and I am certainly at your service, for Postum ended my stomach trouble." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

I should stand a chance of finding a settlement. He left me all his money, which was about three hundred dollars in gold, and urged me to keep my weather eye lifting for the Missing Link, and if possible to capture him and take him down to the coast with me.

"He and I had never been pals, for I was just a sailorman hired to work for him, but when he died, and I was left alone in the jungle, I felt as you feel on a bright, breezy day, when the sun suddenly goes under a thick cloud, and the sea turns gray, and the wind begins to moan in the rigging. All that day I tramped along, getting hungry and tired, and not meeting any game that I could shoot; and when night came I lay down, wishing that I was back at Singapore starving among human beings in what you might call a social sort of way.

"When I woke up it was daylight, and what at first I thought was an enormous monkey was standing over me on his hind legs with my gun in his hand. I jumped up pretty lively, but he had me by the scruff of the neck by the time I was on my feet. His hand was like a steam engine. I could fairly feel his fingers sinking into the flesh. However, I didn't say anything, or even try to twist myself loose. He had me, and the only thing I could do was to wait and see what would turn up.

"We started along the narrow path, I in front and he behind, shoving me along with his grip on my neck. The only part of him I could see was his feet, that now and then came into sight when he took a long step. I noticed that they were like hands. They had fingers instead of toes, and a regular thumb in the place where a man's big toe is placed.

"All of a sudden it came to me that this was Butler's Missing Link. I had often heard him say that the Link would be covered with hair, and would probably have feet something like hands.

"In about half an hour, as I should judge, we left the path and, pushing our way through the jungle where the undergrowth was thinner than usual, we came to a little clearing, where there was a hut built of young saplings, driven into the ground and lashed together at the top with vines. We stopped outside of the hut, and the Link sang out in his lingo, and presently there came out of the hut another Link—a female, as I supposed. The two chattered about me, the male showing me and my gun, and they evidently agreeing that I was a valuable specimen. Finally the male Link stood me up against a tree, and made me fast to it with a rope of twisted tendrils, and then, picking up a big club, went into the forest.

"I needn't say that I was pretty badly scared. Without my gun I was helpless, and there didn't seem to be much chance that I should get hold of it again. I couldn't get my hands free, for the Link had lashed them to the tree with the judgment of an able seaman. I imagined, from his having taken his club with him, that he had gone in search of game, which looked as if he and his mate didn't consider me to be good eating. You needn't remind me that monkeys don't eat meat. I knew that, and thought of it at the time, but a Missing Link has risen above the monkey species so far that I thought it very probable that he might have learned to eat his cousin man, as well as other sorts of meat.

"The female Link sat on the ground about two yards from me, looking at me with what I fancied was a rather admiring expression in her eyes. Says I to myself: 'You're in a mighty tight place, and your only chance is to make friends with these Links.' So I smiled my best smile and said to the Link: 'Glad to make your acquaintance, my dear!' It fetched her the first time. She couldn't smile, for her mouth wasn't built for it, but she chuckled in a way that showed she was pleased, and then she came over to me and patted me on the cheek. I kept on smiling for all I was worth, and talking to her in a friendly and respectful way. Of course, I knew that she couldn't understand a word I said, but I calculated that, being a female, she would understand that I was paying her compliments, and that I was full of respect for her character. A woman is a woman even when she is a Link, and I didn't make any mistake about this one.

"By and by the other Link came back with a dead rabbit, and the two sat down to breakfast. They evidently didn't know anything about fire, for they ate the rabbit raw, pulling it to pieces with their hands and teeth. Presently the female Link tossed me over a choice bit, and when I looked reproachfully at her, as if to say: 'How on earth do you expect me to eat with my hands tied behind my back?' she said something to the male, and then came and cast off the lashing. I didn't lose any time in sitting down and smiling at them both, while I ate raw rabbit as if it was plum duff. They were a good-tempered lot, and before I had got through with breakfast they had plainly made up their minds that I was an intelligent and harmless animal, and that they'd take me in and make a sort of domestic pet of me.

"I don't propose to read off a regular log of every hour I spent with the Links. I was with them close on to four weeks, and they treated me civilly all the time. At night I slept in the hut with them, and they gave me a pile of leaves for a bed that was twice as thick as the beds they used for themselves. The male Link wouldn't let me go into the forest either alone or with him, but that was about all the restriction that he put upon me. He was gone on the hunt for game most of the day, and I stopped at home. That the Links had a genuine language I never had the least doubt, though I could never get to understand more than three or four words of it, and those I have forgotten. It sounded to me something like French, though I don't really know much about French, and perhaps the reason why I fancied it sounded like French was that somehow a man always associates French with monkeys. The female Link and I talked a lot to one another, and it seemed to do her good, though I could never exactly see why.

"I did considerable work for the Links first and last. I improved and enlarged their hut until they regarded it as the swellest palace ever built. I made forks for them out of big thorns, and I was tempted to show them my matches and teach them the use of fire. But I had only a small box of matches left, and I knew that if ever I escaped from the Links I should need them myself the worst way. They never discovered them, for they never dreamed that I had pockets. Their idea was that my clothes were permanent, just like their fur, and as I never took them off while I was with them they never suspected that I wasn't born in a blue flannel shirt and ragged trousers. Why, the female Link mistook a hole in the left leg of my trousers for some new kind of sore, and one day she insisted on rubbing it with some patent salve that she got out of a sort of gum tree. They saw very soon that raw meat didn't altogether meet my views, and after that they always brought me nuts and a sort of wild turnip. Take those Links by and large they treated me the best they knew how, and in my opinion the male Link was more of a gentleman than half the men in Singapore, though I'll allow that that isn't saying very much.

"As for the female Link, I don't deny that she made a dead set at me. Mind, I'm not saying a word against her character, for as far as I know she was a perfectly respectable Link. All I mean is that she took a great fancy to me, and tried to make me take the same to her, for which nobody could blame her. She used to pick out the best bones and the biggest nuts for me, and she never got tired of patting me on the head.

"All the time I kept longing for my gun, which the Links had hid in some place where I couldn't find it. I don't know what they thought of the gun, or why they hid it. Perhaps their idea was that it wasn't respectable for a Link to be seen in possession of such a thing, just as an Englishman, when he goes to Italy, thinks that it is preposterous in the Italians to wear cloaks. I often made signs that I wanted the gun, and one day she got up and went into the jungle, and in a few minutes she came back and handed me the gun.

"I hid it under my bed, a plan which she evidently approved of, and that made me understand that she had run some risk of displeasing the other Link by sneaking the gun. That night, when the two Links were sound asleep, I reached for the gun and slipped out of the hut. I hated to leave them without saying good-by, but of course that wasn't possible. However, I did leave on the side of the female's bed a little bit of a looking-glass that I had carried in my pocket, and I hope it reconciled her to my loss.

"I ran the most of that night, and must have put fifteen miles between myself and the Links by daylight. Then I lay down for a nap, and when I got up and started on the march again I caught sight of something blue showing through the jungle. I had found the sea after all, and by noon I was safe aboard a country ship that I sighted close into shore, and swam to, taking the chances that it was an honest ship and not a pirate.

"Now, gentlemen, you may not believe this story, but it's the solemn truth. The Missing Link lives somewhere in the northeast part of the peninsula, and though I can't exactly say that I found him, I'm dead certain that he found me."

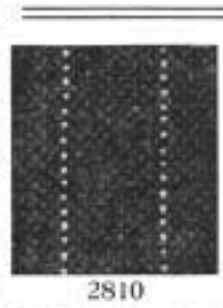
Literary Folk
Their Ways and Their Work

A CLOSE CALL—Mr. Thompson Seton just missed calling down the judgment of the gods, and doesn't know it yet.

¶ Apropos of the very unloverlike way in which the Nature Lovers are handling each other, Mr. W. A. Fraser, who has done something in the way of Nature study himself, tells an amusing story of Mr. Kipling, Mr. Ernest Thompson Seton and himself. The three of them were taking dinner together at a New York club. With many anecdotes and some talk of shop the dinner was wearing to a close.

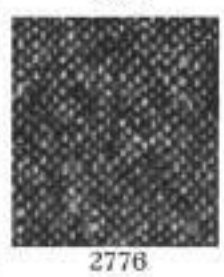
"Fraser," said Mr. Kipling, "have the goodness to pass me the bread."

Mr. Fraser passed the bread and watched Mr. Kipling cut the topmost slice into three parts and sprinkle them with salt. Mr. Seton Thompson (he was Seton Thompson then) was given one piece and Mr. Fraser a second; the third Mr. Kipling kept for himself. Mr. Fraser, of course, said nothing, Mr. Kipling chose to say nothing, and Mr. Seton Thompson was apparently too absorbed in his own story of the particular moment to notice that he had broken bread and eaten salt, in the letter as well as the spirit of the word, with his companions at table.



"I think," said Mr. Fraser afterward, "you weren't quite open with Thompson. You know he hadn't the faintest idea what he was doing in eating that bread and salt; and now, if he should ever come out against you, he'd be damned beyond redemption by all the laws of the Prophets."

"What better could I ask?" retorted Mr. Kipling. "I have you pledged to neutrality and the other man sure to get his just deserts."



TWO NEWCOMERS who have done well and the reason why. A prophecy of success for Mr. Bell's Wee MacGregor.

¶ The critic who holds up his outturned palms to the popular success is no critic. Every reader is a critic in his own right, and no critic can be more than one reader at a time. It is the business of the critic to look into the popular success, to find the reason for it. He is not likely in the attempt to engender one popular success the more, but he can aid many fellow-readers to a better understanding of their enjoyment, to a more thorough sifting of their sensations, to a greater certitude of what they liked in David Harum when next they meet with it in Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch, and Lovey Mary, her successor—and so perhaps, indirectly, they may be of service to the author himself. The critic may be perfectly certain when he lifts his hands against the popular success which he "does not understand," which he "cannot see," that there he has it—that in deed and in truth he does not see, he does not understand, that the fault is in him, not the book. It will not do, like the learned gentlemen who proved by all the laws of physics that a baseball cannot be thrown to describe a curve in its flight, to explain the fact by denying it; some day will come the man who can tell why. It can be taken for granted that behind every "big seller" there is a "reason why." It will not be purely a business reason—the dishonest advertiser only makes known his own knavery; it may not be a literary reason, but it will surely be a reason of excellence in one kind or another.

David Harum succeeded, with all its crudities of construction and tedious sentimentality, because of the native worth in the character of David—he stood out; you could get hold of him. Mrs. Wiggs refreshed and delighted a world always ready for the cheery, the heartsome, the genuine word. There again you had the native sense, the gift of phrase, the kindly heart. (Mrs. Atherton hit it exactly right when she nicknamed the book Mrs. Harum of the Cabbage Patch.) Lovey Mary, which followed, will owe its sale more to the motherly Mrs. Wiggs than to Mary herself. Mary is true enough and her pathetic story is naturally enough told, with the proper lightening of the clouds at the end of her dark days—but it is not the story in these books that counts, nor the drama; it is the shrewd comment on life, and Mary, who is younger, has less to say than Mrs. Wiggs. Another book which belongs fairly in the same class with Mrs. Wiggs is the Wee MacGregor. Mr. Bell, the author, like Mrs. Rice, is a newcomer; like

Lavender and Old Lace

By MYRTLE REED

Author of "Love Letters of a Musician," "The Spinster Book."

Dainty and full of delicate fancy, this latest work of a favorite writer charms by its manner, pleases by its cleverness, and interests by its tale of true love, which sentiment is treated as the most exalting of emotions, but without the slightest touch of materialism.

A Book to be Enjoyed

"With exquisite skill quite her own, the author individualizes in this gracefully told story, the heart's devotion as the most exalted and exalting emotion. Miss Reed has the rare genius of attuning love to thrilling heights without a touch of coarse materialism. Withal she builds on a practical plane, since her characterization is human."—Chicago Journal.

her, he has to do with very plain people; like her, he relies very little on narrative or dramatic interest, but wholly on human sympathy. His book is a series of fifteen short stories which, it is understood, first appeared in a local Scottish newspaper and later, when collected, found no market with the publisher. When the author brought them out himself, however, they found a very large market with the readers, and in spite of the fact that short stories are not popular, that dialect stories labor under an inherent disadvantage with a public which does not wish to dig in a glossary—always incomplete—for its amusement, and that Mr. Bell's dialect is a particularly difficult dialect, the Wee MacGregor stories are bound to conquer all these hindrances, in America as they did in England. They have to do wholly with Wee MacGregor himself, his father and mother, his grandfather and his aunt. They are simple; they keep always their purpose clearly in mind and in the reader's mind; they have a delicate sense of humor and a light touch of pathos; and they have a profound understanding of the heart of childhood.

It is in this sense, and in no surface sense of finish, that they are more literary than other books of their class. There is not only the thing said—valuable, witty or cheerful in itself—but there is the true artistic quality of making the trivial, the insignificant thing, deeply worthy and suggestive in the connection in which it is found. Here is MacGregor at the Zoo—it may be remarked in parenthesis that he instantly found a striking resemblance in the camel to his Aunt Purdie, whom he did not love!

"'Is the elephant's trunk jist the same as a man's neb (nose), paw?" inquired MacGregor.

"'Ay, jist the same.'

"'Whit wey (why) dae folk no pick up things wi' their nebs, paw?'"

Is not that the child? And this again:

MacGregor has had his picture taken. In a moment of thoughtlessness his father has promised that the toorie (tassel) on his bonnet—Tam o'Shanter we should call it—will show red in the picture as it does in life. MacGregor, of course, has boasted of his picture and his red toorie to all the other boys. Bitter is his disappointment when shown the finished prints; he will be shamed before his fellows. His father, with a little ingenuity and a "wee tick" cut out from a red postage stamp, contrives to make all well in the boy's absence.

"'Ye didna say onything about rid toories, did ye?' inquired his father, on his return from the play, with a surreptitious wink at Lizzie (MacGregor's mother) who had the photograph under her apron.

"'Ay, I tell't them I wasna gaun to hae a rid toorie in ma likeness, because a black yin (one) wis finer.'

"'And whit did they say to that?' asked Lizzie.

"'They a' said it wis finer excep' Tam Jamieson, and I hut him on the neb, an' then he said black wis finer nor rid'"!!!

The exclamations are ours.

THE GREY WIG and other short stories of Mr. Zangwill's are too often spoiled by a shop-worn smartness.

¶ There is no more difficult reputation to maintain, and none more dangerous to establish, than the reputation of being "clever." Mr. Israel Zangwill was unfortunate enough to get the name of cleverness early, and it has dogged him ever since. It has become with him an obsession which he cannot escape. It runs a cheaper pattern through his best work and makes the whole tissue of his poorer work. No doubt Mr. Zangwill is clever—prodigiously clever—as scores of quotations from his latest book of short stories, The Grey Wig, can testify, but no one can be always clever, and, even if one could, it would be only to become tedious at the last; whereas to become merely ingenious is to suffer a lapse into something even worse.

That this vicious weakness such a capable and sensitive workman as Mr. Zangwill has shown he can be should never wholly throw off is something graver than a pity. The Grey Wig falls just short of being a little masterpiece, and one begrudges the lack of self-discipline that would have wrought it into what it has every right to be—and yet somehow is not.

Other stories in the same volume are of a far different quality. Mr. Zangwill says in a short preface that he has assembled some of his earliest and some of his latest work; he might have added, some of his worst and some of his best.

Why Some Men Succeed!

A MAN'S SUCCESS is largely due to his ability to learn things and to put what he knows into practice. If the Encyclopaedia Britannica can give you the living facts about any trade, profession or calling—teach you ironworking, chemistry, engineering, science, philosophy or history—can you afford to go without it, especially when you may now get it for a few cents a day? It contains the kind of knowledge that helps men to succeed.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica is without a peer. It supplies just the sort of information the busy man needs from day to day. With its 25,000 pages teeming with thought and facts, written by 2,000 of the ablest minds in the world, it represents the highest sum total of human learning and research. That is what critics mean when they call it the one standard encyclopaedia.

A COLLEGE AT HOME

In the ENCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA you have:

1. A corps of teachers of recognized authority.
2. A series of special articles on every important subject, many of which have been reprinted as text books for use in schools.
3. An outline course of reading which will guide you along private lines of work.
4. A mine of general facts always open to you, giving a fund of knowledge unsurpassed by any college curriculum.
5. A wise friend to cultivate during your spare moments or during the long winter evenings.

And the Price is Special

By reason of our large advertising contracts we have been enabled to supply the New Twentieth Century Edition of this peerless work at remarkably low terms and direct to customers, giving THEM the benefit of the middleman's profit. An enormous number of sets have been thus distributed during the last few months—no less than 252 carloads!—a greater sale than all other encyclopaedias combined.

DO NOT PUT OFF doing a good thing. CUT OUT THE COUPON GIVEN BELOW and send it in before you lay aside this magazine. A PROMPT RETURN of it will entitle you to the special price and privilege of paying for the books in SMALL MONTHLY SUMS.

Oddities & Novelties of Every-Day Science

THE OVERWORKED SILKWORM—He is now driven by greedy capitalists to do his own dyeing as well as his spinning.

ENABLING the silkworm to be its own dyer, transferring to its cocoons various colors in the leaves it feeds upon, is a scientific achievement reported from Roubaix, France.

White, yellow and occasional green are the customary shades of the cocoon. What first directed attention to the possibility of coloring the silkworm's scheme of life was the interesting phenomenon that different colored cocoons are produced by similar species of the worms. The scientists, after investigation, were convinced that the varying tints in the tissue of the chrysalis are caused by different colors in the food material. If Nature thus determines the color of the cocoon as a direct result of the shade of the silkworm's food, it seemed obvious to the investigators that the production of silk of any predetermined shade could be absolutely controlled by artificially coloring the food set before the worms.

Experiments were first made by placing worms on branches of privet (Ligustrum vulgare) washed with red dye. They readily fed on the colored leaves, and when the larvæ began to spin their cocoons the silk was discovered to be a pronounced shade of red. Ensuing experiments included tests with many colors. Fed on leaves colored blue the worms produced blue silk. A variation was encountered in tests with species that under natural conditions produce cocoons of yellow. When fed on leaves colored red the silk they spun was a deep orange. The original yellow is accounted for by the pigment contained in the leaves of the mulberry. Experiments are to be continued. They are being followed with interest by silk manufacturers. Government scientists at Washington are also much interested, as efforts are now under way to encourage the silkworm industry in America. To that end the Department of Agriculture is seeking to extend the propagation and cultivation of the white mulberry (Morus alba) and the Morus multicaulis, the tree upon which most of the silkworms reared in China are fed.

This mulberry was largely planted in the United States many years ago. Few, if any, of the original trees remain, but specimens which are thought to be wild seedlings of these are very plentiful in the Southern States. The trees are thoroughly acclimated and free from disease. It is therefore probable that there is now in the United States an abundant supply of material for propagating purposes, at least.

If the experiments at Roubaix in causing the silkworm to supplant the dyer prove to be practical, a new impetus may be given to the silkworm industry in the United States.

THE HYDRAULIC COP—The train robber who tackles him will find him a very efficient officer.

RECENTLY on a British steamship from Bombay to Zanzibar a fierce religious and race war broke out among several hundred Arabs and Hindus who had taken deck passage. Among the regular passengers was a detachment of British soldiers, and their colonel hurried to the captain with proffers of assistance. The latter, declining military interposition, called an order down the tube to the engineer, and commanded his sailors to direct a hose on the mob. A stream of hot water and steam worked a transformation in the battle scene. Some of the combatants leaped overboard and had to be rescued. All dispersed and sought shelter from the hot assault.

Others besides this quick-witted captain have long known that hot water and steam forced through a nozzle constitute an effective fusillade, hardly exceeded at short range by dynamite. An American inventor has applied this knowledge in a device for preventing train robberies. By means of pipes radiating from the boiler of the locomotive and terminating in nozzles at the entrance to the cab, along the running-boards, over the pilot, and at other points designed to protect the front platform of the first car, the engineer is enabled to repel with torrents of scalding water and steam the approach of highwaymen.

"Opportunities"

is a practical monthly magazine for those who are seeking new occupations, whether with capital or without. It keeps track of the chances of the aspirant in the ever-changing professions, trades and occupations. It tells which of these are crowded and why, and which are not. It tells definitely, in figures as exact as possible, what a person may expect to earn in any line of work. It treats also of the newly-opened professions, such as forestry, for instance, and tells of the chances in the colonies. In short, through its correspondents and experts everywhere, it keeps in touch with the whole world, and the thousands of opportunities it affords in a way impossible to any single person.

"OPPORTUNITIES" does not deal in platitudes and sermons on the necessity of honesty, perseverance, sobriety, energy and all the other virtues. It takes it for granted for the most part that the reader recognizes these qualities as absolutely necessary nowadays in the race for success, and leaves preaching on these topics to the magazines that make a specialty of that sort of thing. "OPPORTUNITIES" gets right down to facts and figures, and strives to give its readers real help in directing their efforts. It tells how a person with a little capital may invest it safely to bring a competence. If you are tied down to unhealthful office work, it can show you how to acquire independence and make money in healthful outdoor pursuits. The future possibilities of irrigation for the person of small means will be one of the topics treated. The numerous ways of adding to one's income on the side is a regular department, and also the chances for women in the professions and crafts, as well as at home.

"OPPORTUNITIES" takes occasion to point out to its readers the fake and fraudulent schemes that are advertised so extensively in questionable papers, and in this way alone may save many times its cost to the subscriber. It at all times guards the interests of its subscribers, giving them practical aid in making their lives successful and in avoiding failure. "OPPORTUNITIES" is an honest, practical magazine.

forward platform of the first car, or who from any near-by position undertakes by threats and display of firearms to compel the engineer to stop, reverse or detach the locomotive, finds himself confronted by a torrent of steam and hot water. Every possible point of approach to the engine is guarded by blinding and deadly jets of steam. A highwayman persisting in assault would be parboiled.

Valves for controlling the several pipes and the steam discharge are placed in such position that the engineer may reach and operate them with his foot without moving from the position occupied by him when threatened with attack. Thus, without betraying to the highwayman any intention of his resistance, the engineer or the fireman is enabled to surround the locomotive at all points with a cordon of steam through which no one could penetrate and live. If the situation does not require a discharge of steam from all points, the engineer can so operate the levers as to concentrate upon any point of attack.

The levers for operating and controlling the steam are preferably located near the floor and protected by the overhanging seat of the cab. They are guarded against being struck by accident, and yet are in such position that they may be reached readily by a movement of the foot requiring no corresponding movement of the body that would be obvious to an intruder.

FREAK FOODS—A pepper warranted to bite, a tomato like a horse-chestnut, and a cucumber that explodes.

THE Department of Agriculture is making experiments with many new vegetables which are expected to prove useful in this country, if the people can be persuaded to grow them. Its explorers are fetching them from various parts of the world, especially from Mexico, which is known to possess many food plants that would be of much value if introduced into the United States.

Among the available Mexican vegetables are various kinds of peppers, and several species of tomatoes which are unknown to us. For example, there is the "husk tomato," which is about the size of a horse-chestnut, and is contained in a sort of detachable rind that is removed when the fruit is ripe, as a preliminary to cooking it. It is not good raw, but is said to be excellent when stewed or fried. The Mexicans preserve it as a sweet pickle.

Then there is a brand-new kind of cucumber, which is quite an oddity in its way, inasmuch as it explodes with a loud report when ripe, throwing its red seeds to a distance. Its chief use is as a medicine, but the vine on which it grows is so handsome as to be desirable for gardens. More valuable is a giant okra, lately obtained from Europe, which has pods five or six times the ordinary size. Soon, doubtless, it will be commonly grown in this country, and will be obtainable in our markets. It has a delightful flavor.

Another European vegetable which Uncle Sam wants to introduce is the tuber of a plant that looks a good deal like marsh grass. It is only about as big as a hazelnut, and when eaten raw resembles cocoanut in flavor. This is called "chervil," and may be cooked in a variety of ways. The plant is a kind of sedge.

Special attention is being paid to the cultivation of new pot-herbs on the experimental farm which the Government maintains near Washington, and the seeds of the best of these, when a sufficient supply has been obtained, will be distributed to farmers and gardeners. Notable among them is a plant from India called "basella," which bears fruits that look like little blackberries. It is a vine, has pink blossoms resembling those of the arbutus, and is said to be delicious.

It is always difficult to persuade people to eat new things—a fact of which the common tomato, which a generation ago was considered poisonous in New England, affords a familiar illustration. Nevertheless, every new vegetable is an important addition to our happiness and welfare, and even a novelty in the way of a pot-herb is a contribution not to be despised by those who appreciate a well-flavored plate of soup or dish of stew.

Despotism and Democracy

The Senator had a newspaper spread out before him, but as Thorndyke approached folded it up, pushed his gold spectacles up on his forehead and called out:

"Hello! Have you read about the 'Wondrous Boy' this morning?"

"I have," replied Thorndyke, smiling pleasantly as he lifted his hat, and in response to a silent invitation he seated himself on the bench by Standiford's side.

"Great speech that," continued the Senator. "At first I was disposed to give you the credit for all of it—but there's something in that fellow Crane. You couldn't have coached him so well if he hadn't been capable of learning."

"You do me too much honor," replied Thorndyke, laughing, but with something like bitterness.

Senator Standiford continued, with a dry contortion of the lips meant for a smile:

"But you'll see, my son, that your friend Crane won't grow quite so fast as he thinks he will. In our times public men require the seasoning of experience before they amount to anything. There'll be no more Henry Clays elected to the House of Representatives before they are thirty. The world was young, then, but we have matured rapidly. It is true that we have relaxed the rule of the Senate a little and allow the new Senators to speak in the Senate Chamber at a much earlier period in their Senatorial service than formerly. But speech-making is a dangerous pastime. Much of the small success I have achieved"—here Senator Standiford's face assumed a peculiar expression of solemnity which made him look like a deacon handing around the church plate—"I lay to the fact that I never could make a speech in my life, and I found it out at an early stage in my career. I'm a Presbyterian, as you know, but in my town I'm classed as a heretic and an iconoclast, because when they want to call a new preacher and to have him preach a specimen sermon I always tell the elders, 'Why do you want to judge the fellow by the way he talks? It's the poorest test in the world to apply to a man. Find out what he can do.'"

"All the same, I wish from the bottom of my heart that I had had Crane's chance yesterday and had used it as well," replied Thorndyke.

"If you had you would have given our junior Senator a bad quarter of an hour," replied Senator Standiford gravely.

Now, in common with all true Senatorial bosses, Standiford had seen to it that his junior Senator was a man of straw, put in the place in order that the boss might have two votes in the Senate. Never had the junior Senator yet voted or acted in opposition to his master; but had Thorndyke been the junior it would have been another story and both men knew it. This caused Thorndyke to remark coolly:

"He would have no reason to disturb himself—the ass! You have been kind enough to give me to understand that I am ineligible for promotion—not being made of putty, as our junior Senator is."

"Now, now!" remonstrated Senator Standiford, again assuming his air of a seventeenth century Puritan. "To hear you anybody would think that our State organization didn't want every first-class man it can get! We have the highest regard for your services, and we do what we can to keep you in your present place because we see your usefulness there."

Senator Standiford punctiliously used the euphemism "we" just as he gravely consulted all the pothouse politicians in "the organization," but it did not materially affect the fact that he was the whole proposition.

Thorndyke looked full into the deep, calm eyes of the rugged old man before him, and could not forbear laughing—but there was not the glimmer of a twinkle in them. Presently the old man said coolly:

"Suppose I should tell you that I may retire at the end of my term—in two years?"

"I should wish to believe you, my dear Senator, but I am afraid I couldn't."

"What a fellow you are! But let me tell you—mind this is a confidence between gentlemen—my retirement is not impossible. You know my daughter, my little Letty——"

As Senator Standiford spoke the name his face softened, and a passion of parental love shone in his deep-set eyes.

"She is a very remarkable girl, Mr. Thorndyke—very remarkable—and she loves her old father better than he deserves. I have as good sons as any man ever had—but that daughter left me by my dead wife is worth to me everything else on God's earth. The doctors have been frightening her about me lately. They tell her I work too hard for my time of life—that I ought to take a rest, and if I will do it I can add ten years to my life. Now, you know, the State organization will never let me take a rest"—Senator Standiford said this quite seriously—"and Letty as good as told me six months ago that if I should be reëlected to the Senate"—the Senator uttered this "if" in a tone of the most modest deprecation—"if I should be reëlected for another term—as she wishes me to be—then she wants me to resign. I don't mind admitting that if any other human being had said this to me except my daughter Letty, I should have reckoned myself drunk or crazy to have listened to it. But my daughter, as I mentioned to you, is a remarkable girl. Besides, the child is not strong herself, and if she gets to worrying about me—well, you can see, Mr. Thorndyke, how it is with me. The world credits me with loving place and power above everything on earth, but there is something dearer to me than the office of President of the United States: it is my daughter. And the sweetness and the tenderness of that child for her old father——"

Here Senator Standiford took out a large red silk handkerchief and blew a blast like the blast of Roncesvalles.

Being an accomplished judge of men Senator Standiford while speaking had watched Thorndyke closely. Had he shown any undue elation over the prospect of Senator Standiford's possible retirement Thorndyke's fortunes would have been ruined. But by the lucky accident of having a good heart he said the most judicious thing possible.

"I don't see any indications of overwork in you, Senator. At the same time I know you do the work of ten men, and I also know the exercise of power is so dear to you that, from the poundmaster in your own town up to the candidate for President, you give everything your personal supervision. But as for Miss Standiford's not being strong—why, I took her in to dinner less than a month ago, and remarked on her freshness and beauty. She looked the picture of health and ate more dinner than I did."

"Did she?" asked the Senator anxiously. "Thank God! The doctors say if she can only eat and live outdoors and play golf and ride horseback she will be all right."

Here Senator Standiford again blew his nose violently.

"She's a little wild, having no mother, poor child," continued the Senator, "but her heart, sir, is in the right place. And the way she loves her old father is the most splendid, touching, exquisite thing ever imagined!"

Thorndyke listened attentively, deeply interested in the human side of a man who had seemed to him to have a very small amount of the purely human in him.

Senator Standiford rose then, and resting both hands on his old-fashioned gold-headed stick he looked full into Thorndyke's face, and said slowly:

"I hope we understand each other, Mr. Thorndyke. We think you a very strong man, and strong men are liable to become dangerous. The State organization wishes you to remain where you are. But in the event that I should be reëlected and should be forced to resign, I have no hesitation in saying that unless something unforeseen happens I should be glad to exert my personal influence toward getting you the party nomination for Senator."

"I understand you perfectly, Senator," replied Thorndyke with equal coolness, "and though I admit I think it a shameful state of affairs that any organization or any man should have the power to dispose of any man's political future, yet it is a fixed fact in our State and can't be helped for the present. So far as your personal kindness to me goes I have the deepest sense of it, and the chances are, on the strength of what you have just said, that I may one day be Senator."

"And when you are you won't be as much down on the State organization as you are now," remarked Senator Standiford. "You will probably be called a boss yourself."

"No, I shall not," answered Thorndyke. "I shouldn't have the heart to put men through the mill as I have seen you and Senator Bicknell and a few others do."

Senator Standiford professed to regard this as a pleasantry, and so they entered the Capitol together.

The most artistic and durable color effects on shingles are produced with Shingletint, which is a scientific combination of linseed oil, coloring matter, creosote, and the necessary drying agents.

Among the many shingle stains offered, Shingletint is conspicuous not only for its superiority, but because it can be called for by its distinctive name, thus offering the consumer protection against inferior goods offered for the same purpose.

When buying Shingle Stains it will be worth while to ignore the "just as good" argument and insist upon Shingletint.

My Interview with the Sultan Abdul-Hamid

Copyright, 1903, by Stéphane Lauzanne de Blowitz. Copyright in Great Britain. All rights reserved. Republication of this article either wholly or in part is forbidden. Reproduction en France interdite. Wiedergabe in Deutschland verboten.

WHEN I left Paris, in 1883, for Constantinople, on the inauguration train of the Orient Express, Essad Pasha, the Turkish Ambassador in Paris, gave me two letters of introduction: one for Said Pasha, the Grand Vizier, the other for Munir Bey, the Master of Ceremonies.

I had not hidden from Essad Pasha my desire to avail myself of this visit to Constantinople for approaching the Sultan, and, although the letters of introduction he gave me were, according to diplomatic custom, sealed up, I am sure they mentioned my wish and suggested that I should be helped to carry it out.

On arriving at Constantinople a good friend of mine, who lives in that city, called upon me. He knew every one and everything there, and I told him that I had come with some friends who were leaving in four days, that I wanted first to see Constantinople with them, and that I intended waiting until they had gone before using my letters of introduction, as I was staying a week longer than they were. My friend advised me to deliver the letters at once and he undertook to see that they reached their destination.

Two days later, on Thursday, we were told that it was the eve of the Courbam-Baïram, and that the fêtes would commence on Friday and last until Monday evening.

This was a great disappointment to me. I understood that I should not be able to meet any members of the official world until after the fêtes, on the following Tuesday. As I was to leave on the Saturday following this only left me four days to settle the complicated question of an audience with the Sultan. During the three days I had been in Constantinople I had seen a great many people and had talked about a great many things, and I had begun to understand that this was no easy matter. The Sultan had never granted a private audience to any one in my position, and the persons on whom I was relying for asking the Sultan to receive me would more likely prevent my obtaining an interview than otherwise.

Missak Effendi, the first secretary of the Ottoman Embassy in Paris, a delightful man, a clever diplomatist, always pleasant and amiable, as well as a good linguist and an excellent functionary, had traveled with us. He told me that I ought not to leave Constantinople without seeing the Sultan, and he had mentioned the matter to Said Pasha and to Munir Bey. With his usual courtesy he had told Munir Bey not to forget to remind the Sultan who I was, and in what capacity I was there, so that he might weigh his words and not lose sight of the fact that what he said to me would not escape publicity. To any one who knows Constantinople and the Palace it will be very evident that after this recommendation, of which I knew nothing until just before my departure, there was no chance whatever of attaining the end I had in view through official influence. Neither Munir Bey, Said Pasha, nor any of those whose responsibility is publicly acknowledged, would have cared to risk the consequences of an audience accorded to me by the Sultan. Abdul-Hamid was too attentive and too enlightened not to take into account the Press, and particularly the independent Press of Europe, and not to keep himself well posted about the various correspondences published in Europe. Now, as it happened, some of the correspondents of certain newspapers in Constantinople, by their free and independent criticism of Turkey and of the Ministers, and the deeds of the Sultan himself, had roused the susceptibilities of His Majesty, who still had a lively remembrance of some of these articles.

Who would be responsible if in my turn I should add to the Sultan's bitter impressions, and who could ask these high officials, whom a glance from their lord and master could annihilate, to accept the consequences of such an interview and to bear the responsibility of having brought it about and of having asked the Sovereign to grant it?

ABDUL-HAMID, SULTAN OF TURKEY

As my brief sojourn furnished timorous officials with a justification of their fears it was quite probable and almost certain that I should not see the Chief of Believers before leaving his capital. A fresh circumstance added to the complication of the question.

The Friday after the Baïram I went to Thérapia to call on Lord Dufferin.

The English diplomat thought as I did, when I told him that I had left two letters of introduction from Essad Pasha—that the time was too limited for me to count on an audience.

He assured me that Mr. Forster had obtained an audience, but that it had been postponed twice, and that as he could not remain any longer he had left without waiting for the day appointed the third time.

I thought, naturally, that if so important a personage as Mr. Forster had been kept waiting like this I might as well give up all idea of succeeding. I asked Lord Dufferin, nevertheless, if he would not be kind enough to second me in my attempt. With his usual perspicacity and knowledge of all that concerns Oriental men and things, he saw immediately that we should have to avoid taking any direct, official step in the matter, as this would only create a fresh obstacle. He told me that he would write a private letter to Munir Bey, merely informing him that I was among the passengers of the Orient Express, and suggesting that, perhaps, His Majesty might like to be informed of the fact. He did this that same day. I happened to know, too, that Munir Bey was always pleased to receive information of this kind through an Ambassador, because in this way he was obliged to convey it to his Chief without incurring the responsibility of having taken the initiative. The Sultan was, therefore, apprised on Saturday that I was in Constantinople, and when communicating to him the note from Lord Dufferin those who presented it added that, having now discharged their duty, they had only to await the decision of the Sovereign. Under these conditions, during the next two days a profound silence was maintained with regard to me. The amusing side of the affair was that two parties were formed round the Sultan on my account, in spite of the unimportance of my personality. Some had proceeded officially, almost compulsorily, and when once their official request had been made they had remained quiet, rather glad, on the whole, of the silence which was maintained with regard to me. Others, anxious, on the contrary, that I should see the Sultan and, in their enthusiasm for him, convinced that this interview could only leave an excellent impression on my mind, were most impatient as the hours slipped by and the hour of my departure approached. They could do nothing to break this silence themselves, nor to get it broken by others, prevented as they were by the note sent by an Ambassador and by the official intervention of those whose functions authorized them to intervene. Things went on in this way until Tuesday evening.

In three days' time I was to leave Constantinople.

On Tuesday evening I received from Said Pasha the following letter:

> Sir: I had the pleasure of receiving the letter from His Excellency, Essad Pasha, which you were kind enough to forward to me, and also the letter in which you ask for an interview. I regret that on account of my numerous occupations I could not reply earlier. I will let you know the day and hour when I shall be able to see you. Accept the assurance of my perfect consideration.
> SAID.

As I was to leave on Saturday this letter was equivalent to a refusal, and I heard the very next day that, on account of Abdul-Hamid's silence about the communication made by Lord Dufferin in his note, Said Pasha deemed it prudent not to receive me, which fact was very evident from his letter.

Thereupon I hastened the preparations for my departure and that very evening went to keep an appointment, which had been arranged for me, with the Sheik Abul-Huda el-Rifai, the Grand Caziasker of Anatolia, in order to complete, at any rate, my interviews with the men of note of the capital.

My conversation with this eminent man lasted until very late into the night, and I have heard since that the next morning he wrote to inform the Sultan about it.

The following day one of my friends came to tell me that he had just received the visit of a person who frequented the Palace who had told him that every one there wanted me to see the Sultan, but that no one dared introduce the subject for fear an official demand for an audience should exist, as that would prevent any other steps being taken.

I understood, then, the tact and finesse with which Lord Dufferin had acted, and I was able to declare that no official demand for an audience existed.

My friend appeared to be delighted.

That same day I had a visit from Waiss Bey, the Turkish Consul-General in Venice, a very distinguished Orientalist, thoroughly devoted to the Sultan and connected with the Palace. He is an active, intelligent man, very anxious to show up Turkey, of which he is an ardent defender, in its best light.

He appeared to know what was going on. We talked for a long time and I heard later that, on leaving me, he wrote a long letter, which the Sultan would see, in which he pleaded warmly in favor of the audience. All these movements, all these applications, and one might even say all these struggles, were going on without my suspecting them in the least. As my visit was to come to an end in a couple of days I considered my cause lost. In spite of this, the next day, Thursday, I heard that Philippe Effendi, the editor of the Vakhit, the special journal of the Sultan, a man who is very devoted to

Digitized by Google

His Majesty, and who is broad-minded and a protégé of Osman Bey, the first chamberlain, had said that I ought not to be allowed to leave without seeing the Sovereign. I knew, too, that Reschid Bey, the Sultan's chief secretary, a very highly educated young man, in whom his master has every confidence, and who looks at things in an unprejudiced way, was among those who were inclined toward the audience. Mr. Guaracino, too, an Englishman, who had been in Constantinople almost all his life, and who used to be a member of the English Consulate, a very active and intelligent man, who was liked by the Mussulmans and a great favorite everywhere, was particularly interested in the success of my enterprise. As I have said, all this agitation was going on around me and the greatest precautions were taken that I should not have any idea of it, yet I understood that all these people had not abandoned the cause, and had not given up all hope of conquering the resistance opposed to them. I felt that I was breathing in an atmosphere which, even for Constantinople, was full of exceptional mystery. The Turks, who usually converse in a low voice, spoke still lower in my presence, and uttered Turkish monosyllables, almost in a whisper, as they glanced at me. I went about like an actor in a conspiracy on the stage, knowing that whatever happened, whether failure or success, the result would not be fatal to any one.

On Thursday, in the afternoon, Waiss Bey came to tell me that it would be well for me to go the next day, Friday, to the Sélamlik which would take place at the Médidjeh Mosque near Dolma-Bagchi.

"But," I said, "I went to the Bairam last Friday and I saw the ceremony and the Sultan; there will be nothing fresh to see to-morrow."

"No matter, it's better to go; there's no knowing. It sometimes happens that the Sultan notices foreigners and asks to see them. Besides, you will see him again, and the ceremony is interesting."

"Very well," I said. "At what time must I be there?"

"At midday."

He had just gone away when I received a message to the effect that Khair-eddin Pasha would receive me the following day at Nichanne-Tache, at half-past nine in the morning. Soon after, one of my friends called to tell me that Said Pasha would see me at Nichanne-Tache at six o'clock, Turkish time.

"What time will that be?" I asked.

My friend began to calculate and then replied half-past eleven.

I reflected that if I went at half-past nine to see Khair-eddin, and at half-past eleven to the Said's, I should never be at the Sélamlik at noon. But as Said Pasha had given me Turkish time it was quite allowable for me to make a mistake of an hour in my calculations, and so arrive at half-past ten to see him. If he received me then I should have time to go to the Sélamlik, and if he did not receive me I could apologize and leave a few lines for him, explaining that it was impossible for me to wait.

In the evening I went to a dinner given in my honor at the club. I asked Mr. Guaracino whether a seat at table had been purposely left vacant, and he told me that Philippe Effendi was to have been there, "but," he added, lowering his voice, "he must have gone to the Palace to see whether there is anything fresh." I finished the evening at the house of Mr. Smythe, a very pleasant sort of man, a director of the Ottoman Bank. I was able to admire, at his house, some charming specimens of the English colony, and I then returned at rather a late hour to the Hôtel d'Angleterre. Early next morning Waiss Bey and Mr. Guaracino came to tell me that they would wait for me, between half-past eleven and twelve, on the Dolma-Bagchi road, to take me to the guard-house which faces the Médidjeh Mosque, where I could see the Sultan quite close. I went to Khair-eddin's at half-past nine, and left him at half-past ten to go to Said Pasha's, who lives just opposite.

I had done well to go an hour earlier, for Said Pasha received me at once. When I took leave of him, although the hands of my watch pointed to a quarter to twelve, I feared that I should miss the Sélamlik.

THE SULTAN ON A VISIT TO THE MOSQUE OF THE SULTANA VALIDE AT ORTA KANI

I had scarcely departed from the house when I met Mr. Guaracino, who had brought a horse and who had come at full speed to tell me that it was late. We found Waiss Bey stamping about impatiently, and we went along at full gallop toward Dolma-Bagchi, when we were told that the Sélamlik was to take place at Bechik-Tache, and not at the Médidjeh Mosque. There every one was waiting in a state of hesitation, for it was expected that the ceremony would have taken place at the Médidjeh Mosque, and although the troops were drawn up, the officers present, and instructions had been given to the softas, yet at the last moment a counter-order might arrive, and the Sultan, with that persistent care not to appear in a locality that has been indicated beforehand, might change the meeting-place. In cases of this kind nothing can give an idea of the rapidity with which this official change of quarters is effected. The troops, the officials of the procession, the horses and carriages, and the assembled crowd disappear in the twinkling of an eye and go quickly to the mosque indicated, without any surprise or displeasure, as though it were the most natural thing; the guard-house looks just as usual, and, five minutes later, a stranger passing by would never imagine that only a few minutes before a crowd had been waiting there, soldiers had been drawn up in line, carriages with the horses unharnessed amidst all the ceremonials of an absolute government whose chief designs to be saluted once a week. But when we saw that sand was being thrown on the ground where the Sultan was to pass we understood that it was certainly here that the ceremony would take place. The Turkish finances are not in a state that allows of sand being wasted.

A few minutes later an aide-de-camp, on horseback, galloped up, announcing that His Majesty was about to leave the Palace and come to the Mosque of Bechik-Tache.

I was then advised to mount on the highest of the steps leading to the guard-house, so that I might be above the crowd and see the Sultan.

My companions, however, looked greatly distressed. At Bechik-Tache the mosque is some distance from the guard-house. It is beyond the little triangular square, just opposite the door, through which the Sultan enters. I was in the midst of all the foreigners who had rushed to see the ceremony, and if I should manage to see the Sultan how could I have the slightest chance of being seen by him! If, just then, I had suggested to my two companions that we should go away they would have been delighted, so convinced were they that we were merely wasting our time, and that I should simply witness the failure of their plans. As these thoughts were crossing my mind a tall, strongly-built man, dressed in a gray suit of European cut, holding a soft hat in his hand, crossed the square which the troops were guarding. He had a full face and dark complexion and a black, stiff mustache. He was quite out of breath as he approached us, and he murmured a few words to the officer in command of the guard-house and then made a sign to us to follow him.

"It's Philippe Effendi," said Mr. Guaracino; "he has an iradé for us to have good places."

We went through the guard-house, turned down a small corridor to the right, and came into a drawing-room which was very clean, and furnished with armchairs, and a wide sofa occupying the whole length of the two windows, which looked out on the square and the mosque. Evidently this word iradé was of the same derivation as "irradiation." From the moment it had been pronounced in my favor I felt that luminous effluvia were irradiating around me. As we entered, the officers with their gold lace, who were seated, rose, looked at me with respectful curiosity, and invited me to take a seat on the sofa. As soon as I was seated a soldier brought me coffee and another one cigarettes: I had become the Sultan's guest.

Suddenly a great noise was heard in the street. The Sultan was approaching. Philippe Effendi said a few words to Mr. Guaracino, who opened the lower part of one of the windows, told me to get up on the sofa, and then invited me to sit down on the white marble of the window.

Every one drew back a little, and at the same moment, in obedience to an order given outside, a clear space was made in front of the window in which I was seated.

I was thus completely isolated, both from the outside and the interior, against the somewhat dark background of the room with the sun full on me, showing me up in the foreground of the picture. I was seated sideways, my legs hanging over the sofa, my body leaning forward and my head out of the window.

I understood that I was posing for the Sultan.

"It is to be hoped," I said, in real terror, to Mr. Guaracino, "that there is no photographer here with his apparatus, just facing us. My pose would certainly not be to my advantage."

The cheering of the troops could be heard as the Sultan appeared in a close carriage with the windows shut. I did not see him very well. I knew he would look toward me; he could scarcely do otherwise as I had been placed in such a conspicuous position, and I bowed with all the respect due to the Sovereign of the country.

The carriage stopped, Abdul-Hamid entered the mosque after turning round toward the crowd, and, the muezzin having appeared on the gallery, we understood that prayers had commenced within.

I at once left my uncomfortable seat and entered the room again, but I had only been inside a few minutes when Philippe Effendi suddenly rushed out.

"What's the matter?" I asked Mr. Guaracino.

"Another iradé," he answered.

"Where?"

"There, the gentleman wearing a fez, who is just crossing the road."

He was right, for the iradé, in the red fez, was talking to Philippe Effendi. The latter soon returned and said:

"An order for us to be ready to go up to Yildiz Kiosque after the Sélamlik."

Things were advancing very slowly, but still they were advancing. My pose at the window had not caused the Sultan to change his plans.

At this moment Mavroyeni Pasha, a clever and witty Greek, who was private physician to the Padischah, came in.

We talked together for a few minutes.

"I am sorry you have not seen the Sultan," he said; "you would have acquired for yourself proof of the stupid untruths that are told about him. You would have seen for yourself how sound his mind is, how just he is and how healthy, too. People say that he has scrofula and is subject to fainting fits. It is infamous. I have never known him ill, and I am the most expensive luxury that he allows himself."

On looking round I noticed that Philippe Effendi had disappeared.

"Where has he gone?" I asked Waiss Bey.

"There's another iradé on your account."

Philippe Effendi came back again.

"Strict orders have been issued to take you to Yildiz Kiosque. When there a chamberlain will tell us what is to be done," he said.

My companions were radiant. Evidently one of those mysterious battles had been waged round the Sultan with regard to me, one of those battles the secret of which is guarded by the walls of the Palace, and about which conquerors and conquered are equally silent. I was gradually penetrating it, and if I am able to tell all the details now it is because, in the first place, I was able to observe everything for myself and also because victory makes the conquerors more readily inclined to be communicative. Very soon the fourth and last iradé arrived and I knew from the faces of my friends that victory was nearly certain.

"An order to go to the Marshals' room and to wait there."

We were now in the stronghold, or rather we were just about to enter.

"But who gives these orders, one after the other?" I asked.

"The Sultan communicates them to a chamberlain who transmits them to officers on duty outside."

"Well, then, the Sultan is not at prayer?"

THE MOSQUE OF SOLIMAN, CONSTANTINOPLE

THE MOSQUE OF ST. SOPHIA, CONSTANTINOPLE

"No, that is one of the thousand European errors. The mosque is not a place entirely consecrated to prayer. People can pray everywhere, since Allah is everywhere. The mosque is principally a meeting-place; all things can be discussed there and they are discussed. It often happens, too, like to-day," and they pointed to some servants who were carrying some trays, "that the Sultan invites those who are with him to take some refreshments. It is well to remember that the Sélamlik was only instituted by the reigning family. Formerly the Sultan always remained invisible, and he might be assassinated in his palace and a successor substituted for him without the people having any idea of it. It was, therefore, decided that, cost what it might, he should show himself at least once a week to his people. It once happened that a Sultan, who was dangerously ill, was nevertheless carried to the Sélamlik and he died on his return to the Palace."

Just at this moment military orders were heard, the music struck up, the horses began to paw the ground, people rushed to the windows, and Abdul-Hamid, leaving the mosque, took his seat in a victoria, with Osman Bey at his side and two of his aides-de-camp opposite, and started. We left the guard-house; our carriages were waiting for us, and we drove to the Palace by the new road.

As we reached the gate of Yildiz Kiosque a soldier acting as sentinel advanced toward us. Philippe Effendi leaned forward and murmured the word iradé. The soldier stepped back respectfully, and by a path which starts from the gate and turns to the right a hundred yards farther along we reached a low door and entered Yildiz Kiosque. Philippe Effendi left us for an instant in order to ask Osman Bey, the first chamberlain, to have us conducted to the Marshals' room. As soon as he entered it a cavédji brought us some coffee and cigarettes. We were invited to sit down and asked to wait.

Ten minutes later a chamberlain appeared at the door, bowed and asked me to follow him. We passed through two drawing-rooms, then along a large gallery divided by a red screen, and another drawing-room covered with fine matting, and the chamberlain who walked in front of me made a sign for me to wait there. I thought that this chamberlain was taking me to one of the Sultan's aides-de-camp, who would tell me when I could see his master, for so far neither Philippe Effendi, nor Waïss Bey, nor Mr. Guaracino, either because they did not know, or because, with that stubborn discretion peculiar to Oriental diplomacy, they did not want to compromise themselves, could or would tell me which day would be fixed for my audience with the Sultan.

After a few minutes the chamberlain who was conducting me stopped in front of an open door, beckoned to me to approach, and I must confess that I was taken aback, on advancing, to find myself face to face with Abdul-Hamid, who was standing up in front of me. The Sultan was wearing the insignia of a Marshal of his army and the uniform of his Life Guards. His trousers were blue with a double band of red, and were held by straps over his patent-leather boots finished with rowels. On his straight coat he wore the military medal which had been presented to him by his army, his cloak was lined with red and finished with plain large buttons of reddish gold, and on his head was a red fez. His large sword, in its sheath of red velvet relieved with embossed gold, to the hilt of which were attached a cord and gilded tassels, dragged slightly on the ground.

Abdul-Hamid advanced to meet me and held out his hand. He was wearing gloves of soft white kid such as are adopted by European officers when on service. He invited me to sit on an armchair and he sat down himself on a sofa covered with red damask with large blue flowers. He leaned back against a cushion and signed to a chamberlain who was standing in a doorway. This chamberlain was Raghib Bey, and the Sultan ordered him to take the armchair next mine.

To my left, between the armchair on which I was seated and the sofa where the Sultan was, there was a small wooden table, gilded and with a slab of malachite, upon which were placed an onyx match-box, a small oval ash-tray, also of onyx, and a cigarette-case of chased silver.

Raghib Bey was to serve as interpreter. The presence of an interpreter certainly does prevent the conversation being carried on rapidly, but this inconvenience is largely compensated by numerous advantages. In the first place, when one is in the presence of a personage like the Sultan it is more easy to express one's ideas to an interpreter, who will transmit them, than to the personage in question. Then, too, while he is replying one can study his face without being preoccupied, because one does not understand what he is saying and one can also be preparing the conversation which is to follow.

During my interview I noticed these three advantages, and, to begin with, I was able to study Abdul-Hamid at my ease.

He was rather above the average height, slight and almost thin; he had a brown skin, warm and dry looking; his beard was black, well groomed and rather short and thick. His mouth was energetic but sad; his nose, a regular Turkish nose, large, long and bony, with a slight deflection of the upper part of the nostril. His eyes were black, rather large, resolute, thoughtful, penetrating but not gentle looking; they were deep set in the orbit, and when the light fell on one side of his face leaving the other side in the shade, his eyes appeared to be remarkably deep-sunk. His forehead was wide and straight, of medium height and slightly furrowed. The black hair which was visible on his temples, between the fez and the beard, was short and almost close shaven. Abdul-Hamid was then forty-one years of age, but he looked more, particularly as he had lost an upper tooth on the left side near the middle. He spoke in a louder voice than his subjects, his language was sonorous, his words distinct, and his phrases lengthened out and terminated without any hesitation.

I expected to have Munir Bey for interpreter, as he is the usual interpreter in such cases, but it was explained to me later that it would have been imposing upon Munir Bey an extraordinary task to have made him act as interpreter for an interview which he had by no means facilitated.

"I am very glad," I said, bowing, as the Sultan signed for me to commence the conversation, "not to leave Turkey without being admitted to Your Majesty's presence, for, from all that I have seen and heard here, I believe that I am in accordance with the absolute truth in proclaiming that in Your Majesty is centred the great hope of this country, and the most certain remedy possible for all the many evils from which it is suffering."

"I am very pleased to see you," he answered, "and I thank you for having wished to judge this country for yourself, for in Europe and even in America every one slanders it systematically, without taking the trouble to examine it closely. I am greatly encouraged in my desire to remedy the evils of this country by the fine qualities of its subjects and also by the great resources of the land. Those who maintain that Turkey is incurable slander us deliberately and as though on purpose. What is required are ameliorations in our finances, in our laws and in our administration. People are wrong in representing me as opposed to liberty. I know that a country must keep up with the times, but the excess of a liberty to which one is unaccustomed is as dangerous as the absence of all liberty.

"A country to which one gives liberty which the people do not know how to use is like a man to whom one gives a gun, the handling of which he does not understand. He kills his father, mother and brothers, and then finishes by killing himself. We must, therefore, prepare the country for this liberty, and that is what I am trying to do. I have opened schools and these are being multiplied. Education, in its various developments, is the best means of preparing people for liberty. I have also organized an administrative school, which has given very good results; its pupils now occupy posts in our administrations; Raghib Bey, here present, is one of them. You see that the idea of making men capable of aspiring to liberty, and of knowing how to use it, does not alarm me. Then, too, not one of our ills is incurable, and we have within us forces and qualities which will facilitate a complete cure. We have not many friends, but our country must be very fine since so many envy it, and their policy consists in discrediting us in order to make an easy prey of us."

After a minute's silence he asked:

"Were you at the Berlin Congress?"

"Yes, Your Majesty, and if the Sultan will allow me to say so, Turkey, on that occasion, made one of her greatest mistakes. When she ought to have been represented by one of her most important and most imposing personages she was represented by men who no doubt were very devoted and well intentioned, but who had no authority, who trembled before Prince Bismarck and upon whom he could impose silence by a mere glance. I do not know why this mistake was made, but in Berlin every one was struck by it, and it was generally thought that the Turkish Government had sent plenipotentiaries of foreign origin so that the eventual consequences of the Berlin Treaty should not fall upon the Mussulmans."

"Yes, you are right; I have greatly regretted what you wisely call a mistake, and I still regret it. I understood it when I saw that Greeks had been admitted to the Congress who had no right to be there, and when I saw that, in presence of their admission, my plenipotentiaries did not protest and leave the meeting. It is when nations have been conquered that it is their duty not to cheapen their pride. But we were in a painful situation, the enemy was at our gates, and we did not reckon much on the equity of Europe, for our friends there were not numerous. There were very few men who cared to go to Berlin to affront the decisions of this Congress, and to give their signatures to the treaty of spoliation which we foresaw. Sacrifices were imposed upon me then from which I am still suffering. Do you imagine that Bulgaria and Thessaly are any happier at present than they were before their separation? But no matter; this explains the mistake we made; it does not excuse it."

"Your Majesty said that you did not count much on the equity of Europe; but neither England nor France have abandoned the defense of Turkey, and Your Majesty cannot reproach them with that."

"Yes, I have never reckoned them among my enemies. We have always sought their friendship, and in spite of all that has been done we have never failed to recognize the necessity of it. Unfortunately, of late, clouds have arisen between us; but I hope that these clouds, and particularly the two chief sombre points, will be dissipated by a friendly understanding."

"Your Majesty is alluding to Egypt and to Tunis?"

"Yes. I saw with satisfaction that quite recently the English Government seemed disposed to evacuate. Do you think that England will soon decide to carry this into effect?"

"I think, Sire, that in England they are contemplating political evacuation; but, although every one is convinced that England neither proposes annexation nor an indefinite occupation, one must take into consideration the political situation of that country. There is in England a force which it is difficult to appreciate elsewhere, and which is called public opinion. When England saw herself obliged to go alone to Egypt it was necessary to stimulate this force in order to make it consent to a costly and dangerous expedition, and at present it will be necessary to allow the English Cabinet, which depends on the public opinion of the country, sufficient time to influence it and to make it admit that the occasion has come for evacuating Egypt. Beside this, with the exception of these two points, Egypt and Tunis, France and England can have no reservation at present with regard to Turkey, and if Turkey, like all nations which are suffering, had not become more distrustful than in her better days, she would understand promptly that she can, from henceforth, trust herself without reserve to the friendship of these two nations."

THE LIGHTER SIDE

"I DON'T KNOW WHAT TO TALK ABOUT"

Little Comedies of Mr. Cleveland's Second Cabinet

BY ALFRED HENRY LEWIS

CLEVELAND, following his second inauguration, called about him certain forceful personalities. And save in the one attribute of honesty, no two of them, had they been set side by side, would have agreed in any least detail. Gresham, border-born, raised in the forests, living in a day and region where the great thing was the man, stood distinctively a natural partisan of the people. He was for the rights of men rather than the rights of money; he would override property, and do an injustice even, in favor of an interest of perishing flesh and blood. Olney on his side was Gresham's precise opposite, though clear and limpidly honest as a mountain stream, and as much as Gresham himself a very steam-engine for indomitable force. Olney had emanation in the conservative, property-owning, property-loving East. As a lawyer he was reared at the knees of corporations. They were the result of two opposing schools, were Gresham and Olney, and as far apart as the poles; and each was honest from his viewpoint.

"There are different kinds of honesty," said Morrison, once chief of the Ways and Means, and House leader when Carlisle was Speaker. "Sam Randall was honest; McKinley is honest; and, when the last is said, I reckon I'm honest. But there's this difference to be remarked. If I were to die a lot of rich men wouldn't contribute a fortune and make Mrs. Morrison rich; if I were to fall into financial distress a lot of rich men wouldn't come about to help me out. And for this reason: my sort of honesty never did that sort of fellow a splinter's worth of good."

Morton, the Stormy Petrel of the Cabinet

MORTON, of the Cabinet, was a wide shot from either Gresham or Olney; while of an equally aggressive integrity, Morton liked war; he was a born petrel and never happy outside the heart of a tornado. When he prepared his first annual report — addressed to the President, of course — the introductory paragraph carried an earnest suggestion that the Department of Agriculture be abolished, and gave the reasons. Morton said the Department was in its argument illogical and unjust. No rights existed in favor of farmers that were not as cogently alive for bricklayers or tailors or preachers. If the world at large were sure of the public propriety of an Agricultural Department, then he, Morton, was sure that Departments of Masonry, of Tailoring, of Divinity, and many more should at once be instituted.

Morton was looking for contention when he framed that report. However, the conservative Cleveland was not; and while he laughed over the pugnacious ingenuity of Morton's reasoning, he pointed out to that vigorous Secretary how, after all, they had been called to power to administer the various Departments, not to wipe them from the earth, and at his request Morton struck out the opening and destructive chorus of his report before it was given to the general ear.

Morton believed in contention for contention's stormy sake. Peace was the only failure, war ever a success, in Morton's eyes. And, because of his innate mood for strife Morton had backed into every conviction he possessed. Bent for conflict, he must be the opposite of an environment. Being among free-soil folk, he had been for slavery in the old day; coming from a silver region (Nebraska), he was a fierce champion of gold; finding protectionists all about him, he was for beating tariff to the flat levels of free trade; hemmed in at home by a solid wall of Republicans, he was a Democrat whom Jefferson would have applauded and Jackson taken by the hand. And yet, for all his spirit of a berserk, he was one of the kindliest, noblest, tenderest of men.

Carlisle, in the Treasury, was not a militant soul. Still, in sort, he had the military instinct. He regarded politics as war and looked on a party as an army. The President was commander-in-chief; there abode no latitude of discretion, no right of argument in a subordinate. An order from headquarters must not be criticised, subtracted from, nor gone about; it must be executed to the letter — executed with blind eyes. This was excellent as a code for Carlisle, since he lacked powerful initiative to originate, and to lay out a course. Mentally he was strong like a horse, but like a horse he was incapable of harnessing himself to a load. Some one must be there to hook the traces as well as to hold the reins for the hauling. Thus directed and seconded Carlisle would move a proposition of government that weighed tons.

How Gresham Held the Gate of Greatness

YOUR Cabinet man has officially two rooms; one is the reception-room, the other that special lair into which he may retire and bolt the door against mankind. When the second Cleveland Administration took hold I, on the first day, was driven to make a visit to Smith, of the Interior Department. There were full five hundred people standing in the reception-room; they were so packed that the much-mentioned sardine in its oft-quoted box was suffering solitary confinement by comparison. Smith was in the second room, and into his cautious presence one by one the callers were conducted. Each remained from ten to twenty minutes. It would take a month to receive the folk ahead of me.

As I could not wait a month I went away. Since my business of the day pointed also to Gresham, I wended to the Department of State. My hope was low; it stood to reason that twice as many folk would be crowding Gresham's portals as I'd found about Smith's.

To my amazement, I encountered no throng at all. All the doors were swinging wide. Gresham, tall, grizzled, straight as a pine tree, smiling like a day in June, was standing in the outer office talking with several gentlemen. There was no sign of an interposing "messenger"; no flunky of place was there to cross-examine you and ferret forth your mission at this gate of Greatness; none indeed to molest you or make you afraid. As I walked into the unguarded room Gresham turned:

"What is it?" he asked.

When my business was accomplished I called attention to his loneliness compared with Smith's crowded house. Gresham beamed.

"They've been here," he said; "thousands. But they've got through and gone away. My system is better than Smith's. He locks himself up and lets in one at a time. Now, a man whom you've kept waiting half an hour feels as though he were entitled to a half-hour of your time. They have Smith alone, and he can't get rid of them. Now I stand in the middle of the room and let in everybody. While one man is talking a dozen others are glaring at him like impatient wolves. He hurries to a close; he cuts his business short; he gets through. The feature of my method is that one caller puts another caller out. That's why I can see two hundred people while Smith sees two. My folks go away better satisfied at that, since, whether for success or failure, at least they've seen me and talked with me."

Gresham was in manner and habit as democratic as an Indian. Withal, he owned a dignity. No one was ever known to slap Gresham on the back and call him "Walt." One would have been as likely to slap a mountain on the back and call it "Walt." He was forbearing and yielding with underlings or ones no match for him in power, or men helpless. But when Harrison was President he would fight him to the bitter last; also he would tear a Wabash receivership to tatters while all the railroad influences of the country were not strong enough to hold his hands.

His Encounter with the Flying Wedge of Journalism

GRESHAM'S good humor and tolerant kindliness would gain proof in this fashion. His secretary was as unusual in his kind as Gresham himself, and lived on the most easy, old-shoe terms with his illustrious principal. There was a newspaper young man — one of your gushing, rushing personalities that, fresh from football fields, carries the flying wedge into journalism. Gresham's secretary took no joy of this headlong scribe who, with little tact and less appreciation for the proprieties, would come down upon one at moments most inopportune like a pan of milk from a top shelf.

This breezy youth of news burst into Gresham's outer office on one occasion.

"How are you, Landis?" cried the breezy one. "Where's the Judge?" meaning Gresham.

"In the other room," growled Landis without looking up.

The breezy one flung wide the intervening door and entered the diplomatic room. As the door clanged behind him Landis grinned in sour victory.

The next moment the breezy young man reopened the door and backed himself out with a red face, bowing and mumbling the while profuse apologies. When the door was again safely closed he turned on Landis with an eye of grief.

"Why, the Secretary is holding a conference with the English and Chinese Ambassadors!" he gasped.

"I knew that," retorted Landis, still with the old growl. "They're trying to fix up the Chinese treaty; but I supposed, of course, Gresham would stop to see you."

The breezy young man crept away, something bowed of spirit. Twenty minutes later, when the aliens had departed, Gresham came out. He smiled on Landis in a paternal way.

"You were playing some trick on that young man," said Gresham in tones of amused reproach.

"He's too gay," returned Landis complacently, "and is guilty of the crime of overconfidence. I thought it might do him good to let him fall into a coal-hole or two; it will teach him caution."

"Still," returned Gresham mildly, "you have hurt his feelings. Being under thirty yourself you should have some tenderness for the youth of others."

"Tenderness!" snorted Landis with deep contempt. "Well, if I conducted my negotiations with mankind in the widespread fashion of that citizen, I should expect nothing more tender than to be tenderly killed."

AND BACKED HIMSELF OUT WITH A RED FACE

The Judge's Wabash Diplomacy

GRESHAM could be stiff enough with gentry of his own weight. He conceived a wrath against the British Ambassador — the speciously urbane Sir Julian. Gresham averred that the Briton on one occasion deceived him. After that he took no chances; there should come no second deceit; nor did he in his methods spare the vanity of the English.

"Put that in writing," was Gresham's cold suggestion the moment the Englishman approached him with any proposal of state.

Sir Julian would shrug his diplomatic shoulders while his diplomatic brows worked up and down. But Sir Julian was driven none the less each time to "Put that in writing." It was a specimen of what Landis called "The Judge's Wabash diplomacy."

Landis was of the humorists. One afternoon he came to Gresham with a letter in his hand.

"It's from my father," said Landis. "He records a curious accident. He tells how with a scraper and his best team — Morgan horses they were, and worth five hundred dollars — he was filling up a quagmire at the back of our farm. The first time he drove through the place to dump the scraper the team bogged and sunk as though in a quicksand. He couldn't get them out; they were smothered in the mire; all he saved was the scraper."

"That's too bad," observed Gresham sympathetically.

"Of course it's too bad," repeated Landis. "But at the same time, doesn't it strongly remind you, Judge, of the State Department — this filling up a five-cent mudhole with a five-hundred-dollar team? It's on a par with our experiences over the seal-killing question."

The Encouragement of a Modest Secretary

JUST before Hoke Smith was inducted into his Department of the Interior he had a plate at a great dinner. Smith was six feet five inches tall, wide as a door, and modest to the point where blushes take the place of conversation.

Frank Hatton, editor of the Washington Post, was chairman for that dinner, and when the Commons, then and there seated about the tables, clamored for a speech from Smith, Hatton earnestly seconded the demand. Smith hung back; he was fair forced upon his feet; there he stood, red and wordless. At last he managed to say:

"I don't know what to talk about."

Hatton, at one time a member of Arthur's Cabinet, thought to encourage the troubled Smith. He would give him a start.

"Thmith," lisped Hatton, "tell uth what you'll do when you're the Thecretary of the Interior. I've been through the mill, and can give you an idea, if that will help you along. You'll find when you're thafe in your theat that an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk will do the bithness and Cleveland will do the retht. Wherefore, Thmith, there exithts no reathon why you thouldn't thpeak your mind freely here to-night."

Why Carlisle Didn't Resign

THOUGH there lived some spunks and sparks of truth in what the excellent Hatton said, his statements were far too broad. Few White House folk have interfered less with what went on in the Departments of Government under them than Cleveland. Now and then he would have his way; a notable occasion being when he compelled the silver Carlisle to turn his coat for gold in the beginning of his term. Vest, Cockrell, Blackburn and others of Carlisle's friends in the Senate could not believe their eyes when Carlisle-for-gold stood forth in print. They had prophesied deeply the other way. Now, when they knew their error, bitter were their sighs. It was silver's death-wound, that Treasury pronunciamento of 1893; it was the beginning of the silver end, and wise Senate men of silver such as Vest and Cockrell knew it. Hence their deep-drawn lamentations. Also their idol, Carlisle, was shattered; he had gone down; Cleveland had broken him to pieces.

"Why doesn't Carlisle resign?" said Vest, wrathfully discussing the ignoble phenomenon of Carlisle-for-gold with a knot of friends. "Why doesn't he resign his portfolio?"

"You forget one thing," said Morrison, smiling. "What could Carlisle resign to? Lindsey's got his Senate seat."

The Friend of the Newspaper Defined

THE stubborn Morton, of the Department of Agriculture, was by training a newspaper man. Long ago, in Wilbur Story's day, and when the Chicago Times was a power and the Government used to arrest its publisher for treason, Morton wrote editorials for that imprint. Perchance it was thus he cultivated that profound taste for combat. Morton had the true Wilbur Story notion of how a paper should be conducted. Said the ill-used Sir Peter Teazle: "Sir Oliver, we live in a damned wicked world, and the fewer we praise the better." That was the Wilbur Story thought; that, too, was Morton's.

Long ago the latter set forth the cardinals of proper newspaper control, as he understood them, in an after-dinner speech. He was called upon to respond to the toast, "The Friend of the Newspaper," a sentiment supposed at that time to conceal within itself a compliment for the guest of honor at the dinner, and who may be supposed to have been a gentleman having charge of the public advertising for the city of Chicago. Morton went to his point with a clear directness.

"I am called on," said he, "to speak to the toast, 'The Friend of the Newspaper.' What is the friend of a newspaper? The friend of a newspaper is a man who wants you to leave out something you ought to put in, or to put in something you ought to leave out. Friendship to a newspaper is a disaster to a newspaper; friendship gets between the newspaper's feet, trips it, and over it goes on its nose. To succeed with a newspaper it is only required that you interest folk; you do that even more thoroughly when you kick a man into the gutter than when you help him out. My own thought is that, for the best interests of his paper, your wise publisher will list his enemies as an asset and his friends as a liability."

GRESHAM WAS STANDING IN THE OUTER OFFICE TALKING WITH SEVERAL GENTLEMEN

The Frills and Flounces of the State Department

BOTH Gresham and Morton were gifted with a mighty deal of what folk call common-sense. They hated frills and flounces, and had scant patience with the mysterious high assumptions of office as though a Phœnix were to be presently hatched. They came from peoples and regions where men eat dinner at noon; where diplomacy is direct and proceeds by that axiom, "A straight line is the shortest distance between two points." And they were impatient of pretense. Speaking of the State Department and its demands, Gresham on one occasion remarked:

"Men are dazzled by the size of a stake. They think because billions are at bay in a controversy the principle involved must be as abstruse as a secret of the tides. As a matter of fact, every country justice of the peace grapples continually with questions quite as difficult as any one will meet in the Department of State. The dispute over our Alaskan boundary involves nothing more desperate than a common case of trespass would present, while our wrangle concerning the Canadians killing seals does not propose so many nor such tangled law riddles as might be flung at one in any replevin suit for a pig."

THERE WERE FULL FIVE HUNDRED PEOPLE STANDING IN THE RECEPTION-ROOM

Morton's Twenty-Thousand-Dollar Bug

MORTON added to this attitude of commonplace which distinguished Gresham a bent to be ironical. He looked on his department as a humbug practiced upon the people—it was root and trunk and branch an imposition.

"Ever been in that little house east of the main building?" he would ask. "That's my bug house; you ought to go in there. I've got a twenty-thousand-dollar bug hived up in that house. Common-looking bug at that; you'd hardly think he was worth the money. You see, he's a new sort of bug. My scientists heard of him, and at once organized an expedition. He was said to be hiding in the Rocky Mountains. It was last summer, when my predecessor, Jerry Rusk, held this post. My scientists burst into the Rockies and took the trail of this bug. They pressed him hotly; they chased him to a point northward of the Yukon River, in Alaska. Then he doubled on them; he was running into the winter, and so were my scientists. Naturally they headed for the South, for neither the bug nor my scientists are such fools as one might think. The hunt swept along until the bug again eluded my scientists somewhere in the more tangled central regions of the Isthmus of Panama. My scientists were in despair. They were to succeed at last, however; a scientist always succeeds. Just as they were packing up to come home they got word that their bug had been heard of in the District of Columbia. You see he had surrendered; finding escape impossible, that bug had come on to Washington of his own accord, and sent in word that he was ready to take the oath of allegiance or anything else we might prescribe. On the heels of the news my scientists came trooping into camp and captured the bug somewhere out toward the Soldiers' Home. The expenses of that bug hunt were over twenty thousand dollars. But we got the bug; so what more could a taxpayer ask?"

"PUT THAT IN WRITING"

The Incident of the Backward Weather Breeder

MORTON was ferocious with his "scientists," as he called them. The chief of his weather bureau came in one afternoon. He laid a typewritten report of two thousand five hundred words on Morton's desk.

"Mr. Secretary, I can tell you in a few words what that is," said the weather maker briskly. Morton looked coldly on him. "The man at our observatory in Baker City, Oregon, has not reported the weather for four days. I set forth the fact in this report. Also, I make the recommendation that our Mr. Smith, at San Francisco, be instructed to proceed to Baker City at an expense not to exceed three hundred dollars, investigate the silence of our Baker City man, and report."

"Yes," drawled Morton with an ineffable contempt dominant in his tones. "Well, we'll send our Mr. Smith, at San Francisco, at an expense not to exceed three hundred dollars when ordinary means have failed. What's this Baker City fellow's name?"

"John Drake." The weather maker was much crestfallen.

Morton wrote the following wire to "John Drake, Baker City, Oregon: Why have not you reported the weather during the past four days?" Within the half-hour he received the return message: "Because the wires were down in the mountains. Fixed this morning."

"There!" said Morton. "Of course that's not the scientific way to do this. It costs seventy-five cents, instead of three hundred dollars, for one thing; besides, it saves time, which is as unscientific as saving money."

Cleveland would now and then take a gentleman at his word in a way calculated to both embarrass and surprise. Particularly was he prone to do this when he thought the attitude of the other one not generously loyal to himself.

When Bissell was Taken at His Word

"THERE'S no use talking," said Bissell to Cleveland on a certain Cabinet occasion, "I shall have to resign. My law business is going to pieces; all my old clients are trooping over to Lynd. Stetson. I can't afford this thing."

Bissell had no immediate thought of resigning. Cleveland, when Bissell recounted his lost law business and the luck of the industrious Stetson, said nothing whether of sympathy or of acquiescence in Bissell's thoughts of a resignation.

Within a week Jules Guthridge, a friend of Bissell, and the correspondent in Washington of a Buffalo paper, came into the Postmaster-General's room.

"Sorry you are going to quit us, General," said Guthridge. "Still, I thought I'd call 'round and give you a chance to say something gentlemanly and nice in the Buffalo papers about your successor, Wilson. If you will, too, you might tell your reasons for resigning. Business, I suppose?"

While the genial Guthridge was getting off this statement Bissell sat glaring with round, astonished eyes. At last he said:

"Guthridge, come over to my house after dinner, say at 7:30 o'clock, and I'll have an interview for you."

"You got your information straight," sighed Bissell when Guthridge and he were walking downtown after dinner. Then he told Guthridge of that casual speech to the President of a few days before. "I did not, however," continued Bissell, "expect to be taken up so short. But I've been to the White House since I saw you, and that is the way it stands. My resignation goes in to-morrow, and Wilson, of West Virginia, will be named in my place.

"Still, you may imagine, Guthridge," concluded Bissell, "how you took my breath away this afternoon when I tell you that your questions and what you stated were my earliest news that I was no longer a Cabineteer."

BY CHARLES BATTELL LOOMIS

A West Point Start

IT WAS in the wintertime and a special train was bearing a company of men up to Syracuse to attend the T. M. A. dinner. Whether T. M. A. stands for Tired Men's Association or Trinitarian Ministers' Alliance or Traveling Men's Amalgamation is not vital to the purposes of this tale. The special had been chartered for pleasure and the host was Tom Chandler, advertising man, who is responsible for the pictures of pretty girls that serve to enliven the advertising pages of the present-day periodicals. He had gathered together a congenial crowd to accompany him, have a good time on the way and make speeches at the dinner.

There were men of business who were glad to take their noses from the grindstone for a few hours; a clever draughtsman who kept up his business even on the train, for he drew caricatures of every one in the party; a clergyman to leaven the lump and an actor to offset him—if he needed offsetting; and in the whole company there was not a man whose life had been plain sailing from the time he had begun to shift for himself.

Why, the clergyman had begun life as a canal boy with a mephitic vocabulary of which it had taken him several years to rid himself, and the actor had studied for the priesthood, but had been seized with doubts of his fitness just about the time the first Pinafore company struck his town, and having a good bass voice he had changed from candles to limelight and a career of varying success. One of the business men had hoped to become a great painter, and had led the struggling, buffeted life of an artist for ten years until it was brought home to him that he had no real talent for the brush; and then he had gone into the real-estate business and made a fortune in five years. On the other hand, the artist had tried business after business with never a thought of art and never a ghost of success until one day his left arm was broken, and while he was lying idle in bed he had drawn to amuse himself and had discovered that he had the talent that the other man had lacked. And to-day his name is known wherever New York papers penetrate, and jealous artists say he has commercialized his art, and his wife is glad of it because—well, aren't his sons going through college?

I IMITATED DANIEL WEBSTER

Only one, the advertising man, had begun in the line in which he had continued, but he had amassed the biggest fortune, which is perhaps proof that concentrative force along one channel leads a man higher sooner than energies poured into various channels—and perhaps it's only a mixed metaphor.

It took the members of the party an hour really to warm up to the pleasures of the day, but by the time luncheon had been discussed and the fact that it was a pleasure party had dawned on every one they fell to telling stories, and after several anecdotes with snappers of wit at their tail-end had been perpetrated, and the clergyman had told a capital story of a best man who stole his fee, the man with the curly and extremely red hair and the mobile mouth, who had hitherto kept silence, overcame his diffidence and told

A Tale of West Point

"Your story of the dishonest best man," said Robert Green, he of the auburn hair, "reminds me of the turning point in my career which, by a curious coincidence, was also West Point. You said that the scene of your story was laid near Cornwall-on-the-Hudson, which is the next station beyond West Point. Rather far-fetched, but I want to tell my story, and one beginning's as good as another."

"Say," said Tom Chandler at this point, "let's get together so we can hear you better."

After they had formed a semicircle of rattan easy-chairs with Robert Verplanck Green, the red-headed raconteur, facing them, they all lighted cigars and stretched themselves out comfortably and he began.

"This story begins with me on my uppers, to speak somewhat metaphorically. As a matter of fact, I did have a decent business suit on my back, but only sixty-eight cents between me and bankruptcy. Have any of you ever been as nearly penniless as that?"

The cartoonist, who was something of a character observer, said in his big bluff voice, "Run along, honey. We've all been there more than once."

"Sure," said the actor, looking up the river toward Troy, and nearly every man in the party nodded assent.

"Well, I had tried hotel clerking and three or four businesses that did not call for any great amount of training, but I was not a success at any of them. In fact, at that time the only thing I could do better than most people was to mimic and impersonate. When I was a kid and ought to have been studying my arithmetic I used to spend hours in front of the looking-glass trying to look like a miser or a madman or a minister, and when I wasn't doing that I was apt to be imitating the cries of all the animals I had ever heard and all the dialects I had ever read. I slid through school somehow, but the day I left I could give old Elijah Kellogg's flamboyant speech of Spartacus to the gladiators at Capua, 'Ye call me chief f and ye do well—to call him chief f,' etc., with much more spirit and understanding than I could give the various rules of grammar and arithmetic.

"Pretty poor equipment for life, and so I had found it. In the intervals of making stabs at different occupations I tried reciting at Sunday-school and lodge entertainments, but there wasn't much money in it, and I had to satisfy myself for the most part with the thought that here at least there was something I could do without breaking down.

"Well, one day in December I found myself out of a position in the neighborhood of West Point with, as I said, just sixty-eight cents in my pocket, a moderately decent suit of clothes on my back, and the rest of the winter before me.

"I didn't know a soul from whom I could borrow money, but I did want to get to New York the worst way because I felt that I could easily get something to do there. I'd never been in New York or I might not have been so sanguine.

Editor's Note—This is the first of a series of stories by Mr. Loomis under the title, The American Nights Entertainment. The next will appear in an early number.

I USED TO SPEND HOURS IN FRONT OF THE LOOKING-GLASS

"It was snowing hard when I got to West Point and night had settled down. I had intended to go as far as I could and then to try to get a lodging for the night, and the next day I hoped to strike New York, for I was a good walker and sixty-eight cents ought to pay for bed and breakfast somewhere.

"I don't know what it was that impelled me to leave the railroad track at West Point and to mount up the steep hill that leads to the hotel and the Academy buildings, but I did toil up there, and when I was half-way up I knew I was going to seek shelter at the hotel.

"When I passed the buildings of the Military Academy and thought of the youngsters who were learning something that would give them life positions I felt pretty bitter toward them and looked on them as a favored class. Why hadn't I been entered at West Point? I was strong, my grandfather had fought in the Rebellion; I really deserved something of my country. Certainly I deserved better than to be on the verge of starvation, with nothing doing and nothing in sight except the winter snow that was very much in evidence and very damp and chilling.

"I reached the hotel in course of time, and going up to the desk I asked the old gentleman who was standing behind it whether he could give me a position as clerk. I think he was the proprietor—or maybe he was the clerk himself. At any rate he gave me the laugh and said there wasn't enough doing to keep half a man busy; that there were only two guests in the hotel and that they were both going away in a day or two.

"Now I had never begged, because I had never got down quite so low before, but the old chap had a sort of a kindly look about his eyes and I wanted to make that sixty-eight cents last a little longer, so I was just going to ask him for the loan of a dinner when something inside of me said, 'Register, you fool,' and I turned the register around and registered my name and—my birthplace. That was as near home as anything I had, having been an orphan for ten years with a different abiding place for every year.

"When I had trailed out my signature he looked up at the clock and said, 'Supper is ready. Will you go up to your room now or wait until after supper?'

"My stomach said 'Get your supper quick!' but I looked at my hands and said I guessed I'd go and wash them. I've heard of fellows that always dress for dinner, even when they are dining alone in a desert or on a raft in mid-ocean, but I only had one suit, so I limited my preparations to a good wash, and while I was doing it I was asking myself how in the world I was going to pay my board bill.

"You can imagine that supper tasted good, because I had not had a bite since the night before, being anxious to preserve my little hoard of pennies. I won't tell you the names of the things that I ate, because it wasn't so much what they were as the way I felt at getting them inside of me. An empty stomach never asks questions.

"I lingered long and lovingly over that supper, and the good-natured darky who waited on me helped me twice to roast beef just because I asked him where he was born and gave him a chance to reminisce, and I felt that he had earned the dime I gave him when he had finished, although I really didn't see how I could afford it. It isn't every waiter that gets one-seventh of a man's capital as a tip.

"When I went back to the office I said to the proprietor, 'Guess it's warmer here than it is in my room, so I'll keep you company if you don't mind.'

"The hotel man was a genial soul with a drawling, comfortable voice, and we sat up to the stove and talked hotel business. I knew a good many of the ins and outs of it, of course, although I wasn't in any danger of becoming a Leland.

"While we were sitting there a young cadet came in to call on his father, who was one of the two guests, and after he left the office I said, 'They're an ugly lot, aren't they? Give you trouble with their pranks?'

"'Oh, no,' said he in his easy, lazy voice, 'they're all right. They're the same stuff that gave us Grant and Sherman and Sheridan, you know. Pretty nice boys.'

"Then I vented what was left of my spleen against West Point, but there really wasn't much. It's hard work to be cross when your stomach is full. I have an idea that the stomach is the most ill-tempered member of the body, and when he's busy he has no time to be cross and the rest of you doesn't want to be.

"While we were sitting there talking there came a ring at the telephone bell and the old man stepped to the 'phone.

"The one-sided conversation ran something like this:

"'Hello!—hellohello!—yes, this is the West Point Hotel.

"'What?—I didn't get that. You can't get the West Point Mills—oh, you can't get West Point Military Academy. Their telephone's out of order? Yes, I know it. I understand. What do you want? What-do-you-want? Hellohello!

"'Oh, you're Percival Ingraham, the lecturer. You're to give a lecture there?

"'Oh, you caught cold? What's that? Hellohello! You caught cold? Oh, you can't come! Yes—— ("'Wait a minute, Central. No, no, I'm not through.) Where are you?

"'At Schenectady? Train delayed? Oh, I under*stand*. Want me to send word to the Academy? Sorry for you. Hard lines.

"'Yes, I'll send word. What's that? Oh, goo'-by.'"

Mr. Green had given a very excellent imitation of the attitude and speech of a man at the telephone—eyes closed, voice steady and low at the beginning, but rising and irascible at the end owing to the interruptions of Central, and when he was through the little pleasure party gave him a round of applause which he took very much as if he were used to it, merely inclining his head and then going on with his story.

"Gentlemen, I don't know whether you see what I saw, but I want to tell you that Opportunity was ringing that bell as hard as could be, and just as soon as I gathered from the old man's repetitions that some one was to have lectured at West Point that night I determined to take his place if such a thing were possible. I knew enough about such things to be sure that as far as West Point was concerned the lecturer was minus a fee, but that as far as the cadets were concerned they were hungry for amusement of some kind—and if I could please them at all I stood to win out.

"The old man hung up the receiver and 'rung off,' and then he stepped over to the desk and was just going to ring a bell for the hall boy when I said, 'What's the trouble?' and stayed his hand. He was one of those men who can't do more than one thing at a time, and it never occurred to his hand to bang the bell because his tongue was talking.

"'Why, this man Percival Ingraham,' said he, 'was going to give a lecture over in Memorial Hall, and he's stuck beyond Schenectady and can't make it. Too bad all 'round. He's done out of his fee and the boys will miss his talk. Telephone's out of order at the Academy and he had to call me up. I could have told him the other telephone was out of order because I tried to get Colonel Miller this afternoon and couldn't.'

"While the old man was talking I was making up my mind. I asked him whether the lecturer was known at West Point and he said he knew he'd never appeared there, but that old General Malet, of St. Louis, who was stopping there, had heard him at home and had said he was a splendid lecturer.

"If he was not personally known to the people at West Point I stood some chance of successfully carrying out the scheme that had popped full grown into my head.

"'When was the lecture to begin?' I asked.

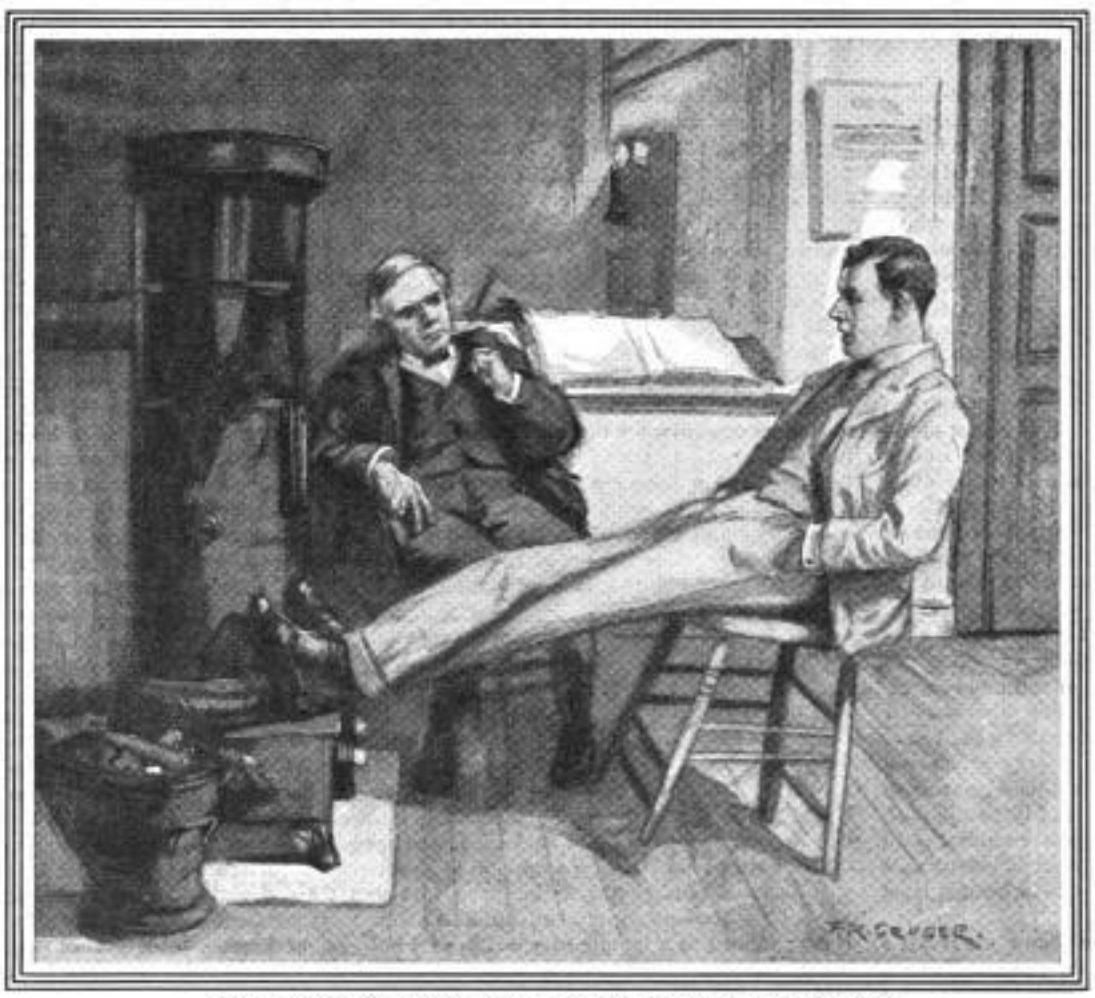
"The old man looked at the clock. 'It's due to begin now,' said he.

"'Well, let me take the message over to the Academy. I'd like to see something of the buildings.'

"'Oh, dear, no,' said he; 'it's a wild, stormy night. I'll send the porter.'

"'Yes, but I'd like to go,' said I, getting up and feeling pretty nervous. I felt I must go and I didn't want any misunderstanding of my motive to prevent it.

"The upshot was that I ran to my room and got on my overcoat and then I came down and learned all I was able to learn from the hotel man. It wasn't much, but at least I ought to be able to play my part all right. Of course, you've tumbled to the fact that I intended to give them a show myself. You know in my business anything is a lecture that isn't a concert or a sleight-of-hand performance.



"I turned up my coat collar, put on my gloves, which were not any too warm, and faced the storm. It was a tedious walk in the face of the wind and snow, but I was urged forward by a desire to do my prettiest before an audience that I felt would be sternly critical and perhaps antagonistic.

"Just as I reached the hall a sleigh drove up to it. It flashed through my mind that it had been down to the station to meet the lecturer, and that in a minute or less the driver would go in and tell the authorities that the lecturer had not arrived unless I could prevent him, so I hurried up to him and said as nonchalantly as I could with my heart doing double time, 'Did you go down to meet me?'

"'Are you the lecturer, sir?' said he.

"'Yes,' said I shortly.

"'Yes, sir. I don't see how I missed you,' said the driver with a good deal of chagrin, and casting an anxious glance at the entrance to the hall as if he expected some one in command to come out and berate him.

AND WE SAT UP TO THE STOVE AND TALKED HOTEL BUSINESS

"'You were late,' said I, summoning my nerve, and I could see by his face that I had hit it.

"I was feeling tiptop now. So I handed him a quarter, thereby cutting me down to something like thirty cents.

"The fellow touched his hat and wheeling around he drove off hurriedly and I made my way into the brilliantly lighted building.

"If you've never seen Memorial Hall you ought to run up to West Point some day just to see it. It is a beautiful piece of architecture, worthy of the cause it stands for. It would be beautiful in any land, but it looked particularly beautiful to me, for I was half-frozen from my walk and it was warm inside, and warmth and beauty are the same thing when you're very cold. I was met at the door by a handsome young officer, plainly a Southerner both by his accent and his appearance.

"He was evidently expecting me for he held out his hand and murmured the name of the lecturer. As for me, I plucked up a double handful of courage and said, 'I'm sorry to be so late and I'm awfully sorry there is no time for me to change to evening clothes. Accident on the road, and I thought I'd better come at once without going to the hotel. Couldn't get you on the telephone.'

"'No,' said he, 'the telephone has been out of order all day.'

"As he spoke we walked toward the stairs that led to the auditorium and he was in too much of a hurry to notice that I had absolutely no baggage.

"'Your audience is waiting for you,' said he, 'and the boys are beginning to get a little impatient. I think if you tell them why you're late it will make a good beginning; although I suppose you don't need to be told the proper thing.'

"He led me through the hallway and up a noble staircase decorated with bronze tablets and with portraits, some of them notable by virtue of their painters and others notable solely on account of the subjects, until we came on one of the most brilliantly lighted halls I was ever in. It did me good to see the light because a great light is one of the best things a lecturer or an actor can have. There were at least three hundred incandescent lights set in the ceiling and they gave a gala air to the stunning-looking audience that was waiting for—waiting for Bob Green, ex-hotel clerk and potential tramp.

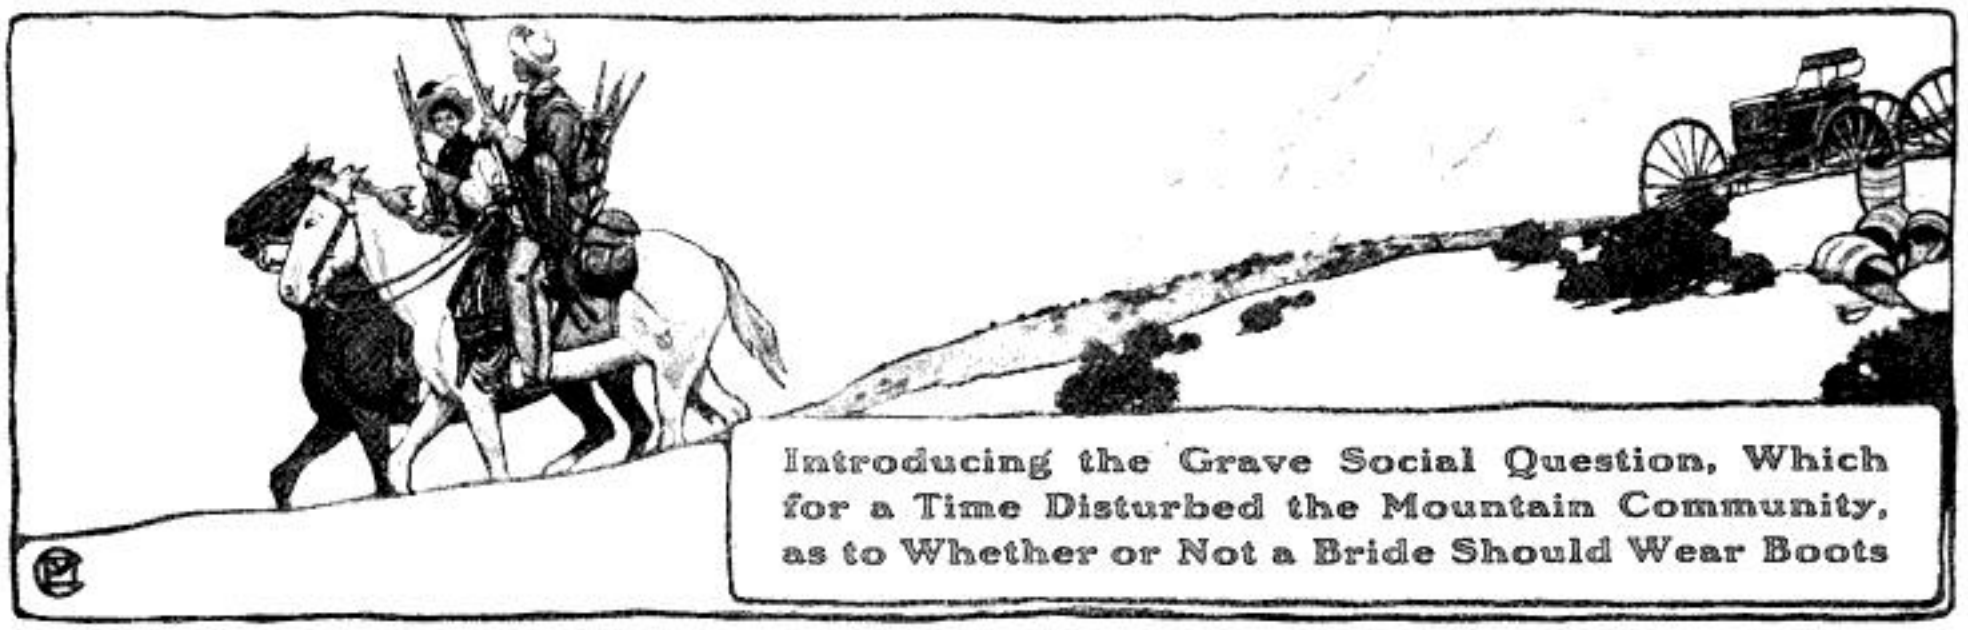
"Of course, they thought they were waiting for Percival Ingraham, brilliant lecturer. If they had known the truth then I think there would have been a general exodus, for five feet five surmounted by a mop of red does not ordinarily carry conviction."

"Were you nervous?" asked Tom Chandler, making the first interruption since Green had begun his story.

"Yes, of course I was, but I was not half so nervous as I had been just after I made up my mind to undertake the deception. In fact, when I actually faced my big audience I was scarcely nervous at all. I couldn't afford to be.

"Captain Randolph—that was the name of the young officer who had met me—asked me if I cared to be introduced. 'You're so well known it won't be necessary, will it?' he said. I could see that he was nervous, and so I said laughingly (and with a great deal of truth), 'I'm not so well known as you think, but it really won't be necessary. I'll introduce myself and break my own ice.' And then I mounted the steps that led to the stage and advanced to the table with the inevitable pitcher of water on it, and bowed to my audience.

"And it was an audience to do a fellow's heart good and to make even a tyro do good work. In the middle seats were five hundred splendid-looking cadets. I tell you as soon as I saw them all antagonism vanished. They were so erect, so stalwart, so natty, so alert. They were flanked on their right by a number of the officers with their wives, the latter in full evening costume to pay honor to the man with thirty cents in his pocket. On the left of the cadets were the members of the garrison, including the band—minus their instruments. All three classes out for a good time and absolutely depending upon me to give it to them. And me innocent of any sort of lecture.



"I don't remember just how I opened my remarks, but I do know that when my lack of evening dress was noticed there were several covert glances of surprise, and so I made the most of my predicament, as you may imagine. Whatever I may have said, it seemed to strike the cadets just right, for they burst out into laughter and applause that gave me a boost toward success.

"It wouldn't interest you if I told all I did, but among other things I imitated Daniel Webster, and not a cadet there could say from personal knowledge that my imitation was a bad one. I had gotten it from my grandfather, who was a born mimic and who happened to be a Member of Congress for several terms while Dan'l was casting that magnificent

The Bride at Heart's Desire

Introducing the Grave Social Question, Which for a Time Disturbed the Mountain Community, as to Whether or Not a Bride Should Wear Boots

By Emerson Hough

Author of The Mississippi Bubble

SO FAR as can now be determined there never were but two brides at Heart's Desire. The first of these, of course, was the Littlest Girl from Kansas; but at the time now in question Curly and the Littlest Girl had been married for more than six months, and had settled down, as Curly expressed it, "plumb like old merried folks." This second bride, the one who caused temporary pangs of jealousy in the heart of the Littlest Girl, was a stranger to the place, a transient visitor, entitled to none of the honors of residence in Heart's Desire, a mere traveler whose tarrying lasted scarce a day and a night. And yet that tarrying, brief as it was, caused immeasurable social disturbance, not to mention other embarrassments which fairly amounted to industrial panic.

In order fully to understand how such epochal happenings could become possible through a simple and unpretentious wedding tour, it is necessary to know something of the industrial as well as the social fabric of the community of Heart's Desire, more especially as pertaining to its two most prominent institutions, the Bank and the Hotel, both of which figured largely in the incidents connected with the above-mentioned visit of the second bride ever known in Heart's Desire.

As to the bank, which was at that time just about to open its doors to the public, it was without doubt destined to be the show place of the town, the apple of its eye, its especial pride. This "leading financial institution" was established soon after the arrival of the second resident manager of the Gold Mills Company, a gentleman who seemed not wholly devoid of enterprise, although later discovered to be quite without certain other equipment commonly and conservatively thought to be requisite in the establishment and conduct of financial institutions. The bank building proper, now just upon the point of being thrown open, consisted of two rooms in the largest and most ornate log house of Heart's Desire. The window-glass of this edifice was of far larger size than was to be found in any other building of the town. It seems to be a peculiarity of all banks to use larger and more expensive window-glass than that employed by any other manner of business concern; as who would say, Search ye our heart, and discover therein that simplicity and probity which constitute our pride! No citizen of Heart's Desire, gazing at this broad front of glass, could fail to realize this gentle invitation, could fail indeed to recognize the gentle reproof to all suspicion which existed in this wide and transparent expanse —panes which in actual measurement must have been at least as much as thirty inches.

The establishment of the prospective Bank of Heart's Desire was now approaching the end of its preliminary stages not without a certain flourish. The stage from Socorro upon this very day brought in the specie that was necessary, and a mule team following close behind brought the iron safe which was to contain that specie. That there were five kegs of coin every man in Heart's Desire knew very well, for he had counted them as they were unloaded at the bank door. If that were not enough for the establishment of a banking institution then Heart's Desire would like to know! A feeling of calm settled down upon the place. It was realized with satisfaction that this second manager of the Gold Mills was employing methods different from those of the earlier director of the same property. It was customary for the latter gentleman to give checks on a bank at Las Vegas, which latter bank customarily sent back the same protested. Perhaps it was Billy Lee who broke up the old system of paying the men who worked in the mines and the mill of the Gold Mills Company. Billy Lee, hearing that his mother was very sick back in the States, called for his "time" at the mills, and hurriedly prepared for a journey home. The resident manager offered him a check on Las Vegas, pointing out that Las Vegas would be directly on his way East. "All right," said Billy, "I'll take it; but if it ain't cashed at Vegas, do you know what I'm goin' to do? I'm goin' to come back here, an' then I'm goin' to kill you. Do you understand?" The resident manager understood. This was the reason that the company had sent out another resident manager, the same who had founded the new bank. At the sight of these five kegs of specie it was cheerfully admitted that the company had vindicated itself. After this checks would be good, and they would be good at home. There was even talk of practicing certain vaunted qualities hitherto not intimately known, the much vaunted qualities of industry and economy; these being traits which come in with banks and other paraphernalia of civilization.

As to the hotel at Heart's Desire, that was an institution of a wholly different sort. If the bank was modern, certainly the hotel was not. If the bank meant civilization, meant things radical, new, progressive, the hotel certainly stood for all things opposite, for the conservatism of the mountains, for the old ways that existed before the coming of the Law. If the bank was a business institution, certainly the hotel was not. If the bank stood for what is known as Progress, then assuredly its neighbor, the hotel of Uncle Jim Brothers, stood for all that sweet barbarism of the past which now so surely though unsuspectedly was slipping away forever from the men of Heart's Desire.

The hotel of Uncle Jim Brothers was a long, low adobe, earthen roofed. The window-panes were very small, where any still remained. The interior of the hotel consisted of four rooms, a long dining-room, a kitchen, a room where Uncle Jim slept, and another room, a sort of guest chamber, where any man might rest if very weary from one cause or another. The front door was always open. The hotel of Uncle Jim Brothers, not being civilized but utterly barbaric, was anchorage for the Dead Broke. It was haven for all sick, sad or weary folk. It was a mission of brotherhood. There was a citadel of strength, my brethren, although we did not know it; there was a great institution, though we recognized it not; there was a temple of charity, of kindness, of hope, though we, being blind, saw it not, and ran after other things, things of the new days, forgetting the sweetness and the strength of the days which now are old. Ah! Uncle Jim Brothers, where are you to-day across this teeming sea of years? Gone back to Kansas, perhaps? Not—no! I will not believe that you have gone Over the Range. Ah! Uncle Jim, if this shall find you, though you be a thousand miles away, at least one of those who knew the anchorage of the Dead Broke at Heart's Desire will cross those thousand miles to see you; and if you can lead us to any land to-day like that of Heart's Desire, then some scores of us, scattered from the Andes to the Yukon, or stranded here in the States, will band up and follow you for love of the days that were.

Now, prior to the advent of the new bank, Uncle Jim Brothers' place had been in a way both hotel and bank. There was in Heart's Desire, at least before this recent coming of the five kegs of specie, only $300 in the total and combined circulating medium. That was all the money there was. No one could be richer than $300, for that was the limit of all wealth, as was very well known. To many who have not lived in a Land before the Law this may seem a restricting and narrowing feature; but as a matter of fact, $300 is not only plenty of money for one man to have, but it is plenty for a whole town to have. The wealth of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, for instance, or of any other of our millionaires, is really far more than he needs; and $300 would do him just as much good—indeed, might possibly do him much more good.

As to this circulating medium in Heart's Desire, it might have been called small but sufficient. If one man had it to-day, another had it to-morrow. There is no evener like the great American game of poker, nor any agency better for the equitable distribution of wealth, although this fact seems to have been overlooked by writers upon political economy, whose experience is necessarily limited. This money, this $300, this total circulating medium—"'twas mine, 'twas his," and was the slave of very many at one time or another in the course of a year. Not even Johnny Hudgens of the Lone Star was able to retire overmuch of it from circulation. Any man of Heart's Desire would have told you that $300 is ample for any town.

These latter facts are offered in explanation of certain phenomena which might have been witnessed any day in the hotel of Heart's Desire. A stranger dropping into that hostelry, and taking a glance behind the front door, might have thought that he was in an armory or some place devoted to the sale of firearms. There were many nails driven into the wooden window facings, the door-jambs and elsewhere, and all these nails held specimens of weapons. Excellent weapons they were, too, as good and smooth running six-shooters as ever came out of Colt's factory; and Winchesters which, if they showed fore ends bruised by saddle-tree and stocks dented by rough usage among the hills, none the less were very clean about the barrels and the locks. At times, more especially about the middle of the week, there were dozens of these guns and rifles to be seen on the wall at Uncle Jim's hotel. The visible supply fluctuated somewhat. Any observer of industrial economics might have discovered it to move up or down in unison with the current amount visible of the circulating medium.

I do not know who first invented the system which obtained at Uncle Jim Brothers' hotel. Certainly it was not Uncle Jim himself, for he never asked cash or security of any man. If a man paid, very well. If he could not pay, it would have been unkind to ask him, for assuredly he would have paid if he could, as Uncle Jim very well knew. And if he could not pay, none the less he needed to eat, as Uncle Jim also knew very well. There were no printed rules or regulations in Uncle Jim's hotel. There was no hotel register. There were no questions ever asked. Uncle Jim felt that his mission, his duty was to feed men. For the rest he often had to do his own cooking, for Mexicans are very undependable; and if a man is busy in the kitchen, how can he attend to the desk? Indeed, there was no desk. The front door was always open, the tables were always spread. That any man should take advantage of this state of affairs was something never dreamed in Heart's Desire. Yet one day a sensitive young man, fresh from the States, who had blundered, God knows how, down into Heart's Desire, and who was at that time reduced to a blue shirt, a pair of overalls, one law book, one six-shooter and one dime, slipped into the hotel of Uncle Jim Brothers since by that time he was very hungry. He sat on the edge of the bench and dared not ask for food; yet his eyes spoke clearly enough for Uncle Jim. The latter said naught, but presently returned with a large beefsteak which actually sputtered and frizzled with butter, a thing undreamed! "Get 'round this," said Uncle Jim, "and you'll feel better."

Who would not go a thousand miles to see Uncle Jim Brothers to-day? The young man "got 'round" the beefsteak. Perhaps it was the feeling about the butter, which of itself was a thing unusual. At any rate, as he went out, the young man quietly hung up his six-shooter behind Uncle Jim's door. This act meant, of course, that for the time he was legally dead: he no longer existed. The six-shooter hung there for nearly four months, and Uncle Jim said nothing of pay, and the meals were regular and good. The intention of every man in that little valley to do "about what was right" was silently and fully evidenced. That a man would give up his gun was proof enough of that. So this became the custom of the place, the unwritten law. When by any chance a man got hold of enough of the $300 to settle his bill with Uncle Jim, he walked in, handed over the cash, and without comment of his own or of any one else, took down his gun from behind the door, and then walked off down the street with his head and his chest much higher in the air. It is astonishing how much business, how much safe business, can be done in a community with $300 and a good general supply of six-shooters.

On this particular day in question, thanks to certain pernicious activity of Johnny Hudgens at the Lone Star on the night previous, nearly all the six-shooters of Heart's Desire were hanging behind the door of Uncle Jim Brothers, pending the arrival of better days. The financial situation stood thus: Johnny Hudgens had all the $300, and Uncle Jim Brothers had all the guns. Temporarily, male Heart's Desire did not exist. This situation was not of itself dangerous, and indeed not entirely novel, having been at least approached in other times of tight money in Heart's Desire. The crisis might have been easily tided over had it not been for the arrival, at precisely this interesting juncture, of the bride who has been mentioned aforesaid as coming to Heart's Desire.

If the situation was epochal when the treasure train with its five kegs of specie drove into town, what should be said of the popular eagerness when there appeared from Baxter Cañon way a well-worn buckboard, drawn by a likely span of broncos, and occupied by two persons, one of whom was a woman? The man, as presently appeared, was tall, dark, self-possessed, and dressed in the garb of the land, .45 and all. As to the woman, it could only be said that she was small, petite, and of shrinking mien. Her attire was semi-Mexican, although the wearer seemed to hurried observation not wholly Mexican. The strangers appeared a bit mysterious, and the situation became still more interesting when the young man strode boldly into Uncle Jim Brothers' hotel and announced that he and the young lady had just been married, and that, having arrived at this unqualifiedly unworthy hole of Heart's Desire, they now proposed to pass the night there. He did not mention the place where the wedding had taken place, did not refer to his past residence, or state where he purposed to make his future home. He did not register at the hotel, for the simple reason that there was not any hotel register. In that land man went and came as he liked, and no man asked questions. Yet, since a groom was almost as rare as a bank at Heart's Desire, small wonder that the population was almost upon the point of forgetting etiquette and seeking information pointblank of these newly-arrived travelers. Every one wanted to know about the new bride. This was what caused the Littlest Girl from Kansas to experience sore heartburnings. "She shore seems some crazy over this here," admitted Curly frankly.

The anomalous new bridegroom and the mysterious new bride went into Uncle Jim Brothers' hotel for dinner, and there they ate as those should eat who travel far. The bridegroom did not lay off his gun, but little attention was paid to this obvious violation of mountain etiquette. "Like enough he's some rattled," said Curly with the wisdom of experience. "I know how that is."

"But did you notice how the bride done et?" said Mackinney. "I seen a bride oncet, back home. All I got to say is, this here bride is some coarse. Not that I want to be findin' any fault."

"I can't make out where she got them Mexican clothes," said McGinnis, foreman of the ore dump. "She ain't Mexican, and she ain't white."

"Anyhow, they're almighty unsocial," said Mackinney. "As though we didn't have a bride o' our own!"

"Vat's the madder vith you poys unt dem clodings?" said Whiteman the Jew. "It's like enough der hyoung feller boughd der laty der best clodings he gould find vere he vas at. Do youse all expegd a mairchant in a plazida by der Rhio Chrand to geep a Proadway stockg of pride goots? How many vas he goin' to sell in a year? Der hyoung laty do der pest she gould. Vhat!"

This view of Whiteman's came to be accepted as practical by most of the population, who by three o'clock had withdrawn more or less en masse to the upper part of the street, with the purpose of discussing the stirring and singular events now crowding so thickly upon the social horizon of Heart's Desire. The discussion lasted pretty much all the afternoon, and was not wholly unproductive of results. There was more combed hair at Uncle Jim Brothers' supper-table that night than was ever seen there before or since, and more than one necktie, fished out from some unknown hiding-place, adorned a shirt front long unaccustomed to such decoration.

At supper-time the bridal couple retained their frigid reserve, eating busily and in silence; yet, as was observed out of the corner of the eye of Heart's Desire, they seemed, after all, not so timid and embarrassed as might have been. When the bridegroom wished for anything he called for it in a tone whose volume and insistence marked him as master of his faculties; and as to the bride, she was more than once seen casting glances more or less direct about the room. After supper the two rose and started into the room which Uncle Jim kept as his guest-room, and which was now generally dignified by the name of the bridal chamber. Passing the point where the hotel desk would have been had there been any such desk, the bridegroom paused for a moment, and gazed briefly at the array of firearms which hung behind the door. Then he cast a second glance at the beltless waist of the male humanity of Heart's Desire. A strange look passed for an instant across his dark, impassive features as he stepped on into the further room. This passing shadow was not more one of interest than of perplexity. Heart's Desire was not alone engaged in interesting puzzles upon that evening. At the window of the bridal chamber one in passing heard the bridegroom say, with a certain gloom in his voice, "It looks mighty queer!" Indeed, from any angle things did look queer in Heart's Desire. The population went to bed that night keyed up to such state of excitement as had never been known in all the history of the community.

FOR THE TIME HE WAS LEGALLY DEAD: HE NO LONGER EXISTED

Heart's Desire slept lightly that night. There was a feeling of eagerness in the air, as though we were upon the eve of some great event. It was about half-past one o'clock in the morning when I was startled by a knock at my door. It was Dan Anderson who entered, and who presently sat down upon the edge of the table as he rolled for himself an inevitable cigarette. At length he remarked carelessly, "I was just thinking of the bride, down there at Uncle Jim's."

Knowing something of a Girl Back in the States in Dan Anderson's case, I said nothing. There were so many cases in Heart's Desire of Girls Back in the States. "It ain't so strange that a bride should wear spurs under her skirts," resumed Dan. "No, not a bit." He puffed on for a few moments. "No, that ain't it," said he. "That's common. But why should this particular bridal couple have two cow-saddles along, when they're traveling by buckboard? That's what troubles me."

Now this gentle, childlike paradise of the Southwest was not wholly so soft and mild as it appeared. The valley of Heart's Desire lay in the heart of the wildest and most savage land which ever was in all the West, a land of which less was then known or is now known than of any region on either flank of the Rockies. Sixty miles away the Lincoln County war was raging, its battles unknown then and now to the outer world. A hundred corpses already lay about in the brown foothills or the pifion-covered mountains of the land surrounding Heart's Desire. Already the men of that village were accustomed, as were those down toward the Hondo and the Felix and the Pecos, to meet all travelers with hand close to one's gun, and to be careful of asking or answering questions when among strangers. To which faction, that of the Kid or that of the Chisums, did the chance rider met on the mountain trail belong? It was sometimes essential to guess quickly and to guess correctly. Therefore some import might have been discovered in these casual remarks of Dan Anderson at midnight.

There were others who felt this vague atmosphere of doubt. These things go by a sixth sense, and men who live among dangers learn to scent danger intuitively, just as animals do. Dan Anderson and I had hardly stepped out of the door before we met Curly, McGinnis, Mackinney and several others coming down the street.

"I ain't for disturbin' no man at this sort-o' time," said Curly apologetically. "But then, I'm d——d!" Which speech seemed to cover the general attitude of mind at that particular moment.

After all, it was too late. It was bright moonlight, and never in all the world was such a moon as that of Heart's Desire. At one time or another this community had been shot up in sport or earnest by this, that or the other man or party of men seeming to find sufficient reason therefor; but never in all the history of that long, crooked, bloody little street had there been so continuous a rattle of shots as now began to pop and crackle and echo from Baxter Peak to old Carrizo. There swung at full gallop into the street a long, low buckboard, with creaking floor planks but well greased wheels which cut the dust into ribbons as the horses buckled down, belly to the ground, on the way to Baxter Cañon. There were two figures in the buckboard, one whose dress skirt came scarcely to the knees. Neither was driving, so far as could be seen. Both stood erect; and from right and left of each figure, the tall and the short, there issued a scarce broken stream of fire and a rolling series of reports.

"Yeeeeee-ip!" sang the bridegroom, and "Hi-i-yeeeeeee!" sang his bride, until voices and shots faded away along the trail to Baxter Cañon. It was unparalleled. It was glorious! The smell of powder straightened up each man of Heart's Desire into an attitude of eagerness, the blood surging into his hair. With unanimity the right hand of Heart's Desire made a semi-circular movement to the left and back. And then, with equal unanimity, the manhood of Heart's Desire sank down, crestfallen and abashed. Heart's Desire was disarmed. It was legally dead. It did not exist. The collateral of Heart's Desire, the conjoint sign and symbol of its manhood, hung behind the door of Uncle Jim Brothers' hotel!

At least it had done so. Thus passed the second bride ever known in Heart's Desire. Misfortunes do not come singly. Upon that same night Heart's Desire lost its bank. The reason why the new resident manager took the first opportunity to leave town was discovered upon the following morning. He did not care to remain and be hung. For, following down the trail to Baxter Cañon, where the swerving horses had carried the flying buckboard, certain persons found the mark in the trail where one of the kegs of the bank of Heart's Desire had jumped the buckboard rail, and gone down over the edge of the trail to the bottom of a deep arroyo. It lay there far below with the bottom burst out; and there, scattered about in the red sand, lay hundreds of shining—nails! They were tenpenny nails, and very valuable in many ways, though I believe that not even the Napoleons of to-day have ever thought of them as useful in the establishment of financial institutions.

The Littlest Girl from Kansas was among those who in the morning visited the bridal chamber at Uncle Jim's hotel. There were many stumps of cigarettes, likewise the ruffle of a dress skirt carelessly torn off and abandoned, upon the floor.

"Bride!" said the Littlest Girl from Kansas. "Bride! Huh!" And so turned away.

At ten o'clock that morning there came into town a certain sheepherder known as William Willey, or Bill Willey, commonly called Willie Bill for short, because he stuttered and was "some loco," as are all sheepherders of seven years' experience. Willie Bill was for some time unable to talk, but finally added something to the suspicions of the population.

"I s-s-see—I s-s-see—I s-seen something," said Willie Bill. "D-d-do b-b-b-brides wear b-b-boots? This o-o-one w-w-w-was w-w-wearin' b-b-boots. They sh-sh-sh-shot me up a f-f-f-few, and d-d-d-done took my g-g-gun, an' I g-g-got s-s-scared, I got scared, I did."

Later it was learned from Willie Bill that the bridegroom and his bride had abandoned the buckboard at the edge of the mesa below Baxter Cañon. They had opened the remaining four kegs. Three of these also contained nails.

"This here feller only got some confused," said Curly, referring to the late resident manager of the gold mills and the bank. "He really meant for to start a hardware store, but he got sidetracked with this here bank idea."

The fourth keg, however, really had contained money, silver dollars, half-dollars and quarters, almost as much as the total hitherto existing circulating medium of Heart's Desire. The bridal couple had stuffed their pockets and their saddle pouches with as much silver as they could carry. They had left silver in order to carry away firearms. How they did it no man could tell, but they managed to take away practically the last six-shooter and rifle which had belonged to the population of this bereft community.

"They l-l-look, they l-l-looked l-l-like haystacks, them f-f-folks, they did," said Willie Bill, describing the appearance of the newly-married couple as they moved off after abandoning the buckboard. The "littlest un," according to Willie Bill, at that time had on no skirt at all, though still retaining the bright, flowered-silk bodice, the long, flowing Mexican mantilla, and a picture hat whose like, as one may testify, has not since been seen in any corner of the land. Willie Bill was not appeased even after having food and drink offered him. Something was upon his mind. "D-d-d-do b-b-brides wear b-b-boots?" he wailed continually.

"No, Willie," said Dan Anderson, gently removing the cigarette from his mouth as he spoke; "I think we may as a community decide that boots are not the correct upholstery for any self-respecting bride.

"I reckon it was the Kid, all right," said Dan Anderson a moment later. "I hope he ain't plumb disappointed at our financial methods. It stands to reason we want strangers to go away with good impressions of the place."

Mackinney was of the opinion that the Kid and the bridegroom were doing wrong in robbing the town of its bank and its stock of firearms at the same time. "Just look," said he. "We'd lay up money, wouldn't we, a-followin' them now, with not a shootin'-iron left in town!"

Thus it may be seen that there were grave social and industrial problems attendant upon this somewhat haphazard visit of the bride to Heart's Desire. We had been deprived of our bank, and not even the hotel had been left free from a certain blow to its system. To be sure, there was something like a half-keg of silver money, but the question arose as to the ownership of this coin. It was then that Blackman, J. P., rendered the most famous decision of his life. "It's plumb legal," said Blackman, J. P., "to use this here speshu of the late bank in trust until the owner of the bank comes back."

The owner of the bank never did come back. The bride never came back. The six-shooters of Heart's Desire never came back. The community, shorn of its strength, legally dead, since it was practically weaponless, for weeks listened timorously for the sounds of the Lincoln County war, now rolling perilously near just over the Divide.

As to Heart's Desire, it registered its firm dislike for all brides who wore boots.

OUR AMERICAN SNOBS

By James L. Ford—The Patron of the Fine Arts

ONE afternoon not many years ago I sat in a London drawing-room munching cake, drinking tea and telling people I was glad to meet them. Now and then I uttered "an awfully clever American joke," as such pleasantries are termed by fun-loving Britons, and watched its uncertain course as it sped about the room provoking guffaws of laughter at unexpected places until its force was spent, for all the world like that old-fashioned piece of fireworks, the "nigger chaser." An extremely beautiful bit of pottery attracted my attention, and I asked my hostess, a noted authority on such matters, and a writer known in this country as well as her own, what it was. English women of breeding often surprise us by their brusque fashion of enunciating wholesome truths, and it was in this spirit that the lady of art and letters made answer:

"You Americans have a habit, which is not unknown in other parts of the world, of laughing at the English people and calling them insular and provincial and narrow. Well, you would be better off if you were to evince a little of that provincial and insular spirit in an appreciation of some of the beautiful things created in your own country. That piece of pottery, which you do not seem to recognize, is from America, but if it were made in Munich or Moscow or Rome there would be a specimen of it in half the rich houses in New York. It cannot, however, be made in any city in Europe, and I have this piece here because I am writing something about it for the leading art magazine of Germany. It is greatly admired here and on the continent as well—this pottery of yours—and so it would be in your own country were it made in Europe or India and sold to you under some foreign name."

I was reminded of this conversation on the night that Mrs. Grinders came bursting into Mrs. Catnip's dining-room to announce that Mrs. "Fen" Bertram, Miss Wynn Mordaunt and two or three other members of what is termed in Park Row "the fashionable, intellectual set," had "discovered" a remarkable Portuguese actor who was performing in a small theatre on the edge of Mulberry Park and had determined to "make him the fashion" by their patronage.

"I tell you what it is," cried Mrs. Grinders, "those Four Hundred folks are no fools. Just think how smart it is of them to go down into that dirty, out-of-the-way street and find a man who's a second Booth. I always said that Mrs. 'Fen' was a clever, brainy little woman to put herself where she is in the smart set, and this proves it. If that dago actor turns out to be what she says he is, it'll make her the leader of the intellectual set."

"She won't be no leader so long as Winnie Mordaunt hangs on," said Mrs. Taffeta. "Ever since she started in translatin' them Rooshian dramas into English, an' givin' talks an' conversaziones an' what not on this, that an' the other foreign subjeck, she's been the acknowledged intellectual leader of society, an' they can't down her. It was her that got up the Scandinavian Lenten mornings that was all the go last season. Oh, you can laugh all you like," she continued, addressing herself with some asperity to me as I sat grinning over my food, "but I happen to know that when Matthew Arnold—and he's about as intellectual and literary as they make 'em—was in New York he said that nothing ever gave him greater pleasure than meeting the intellectual set of the Four Hundred."

"I WON'T ACCEPT ANY EXCUSES"

While it is gratifying to learn that Mr. Arnold had a sufficient sense of humor to find entertainment in that curious blend of fashion and wit to which we owe the discovery of the Portuguese actor in Mulberry Park, it is positively disheartening to reflect on the true and sensible, if mortifying, speech of the English woman, and the contemptuous rebuke to our snobbish worship of the foreign brazen calf implied in her words. Years ago we were ridiculed for our self-assertive pride in our native land and all its products, but it seems to me that we have entered upon another phase of our national life that is far more demoralizing in its influences and infinitely less worthy of a virile, progressive young nation.

Understand me, I have no sympathy whatever with that wretchedly narrow spirit of "know-nothingism" which would drive everything foreign from our doors and "protect" the native arts by placing an exorbitant import duty on the paintings of Millais and Meissonier and the books of Tolstoi, Daudet and Goethe, and bar out such players as Irving, Duse and Bernhardt. In order to realize the amount of our debt to European artists and writers, we have only to remember what we owe to Henry Irving, who has raised the entire standard of dramatic production in this country by his splendid manner of presenting plays, and to Coquelin, Duse, Bernhardt, Sonnenthal, Geistinger, Terry, Réjane, Barnay and a score of others, not alone for the pleasure that they have given us but for what they have taught our own artists of the difficult and fascinating art of acting.

The snobbery against which I raise my voice—and which is, after all, but a single phase of this disgusting worship of a foreign calf because it is foreign—is that which finds expression in the exploiting of a foreign actor by a parcel of women who, I will venture to say, do not know the names of the best American players and who have never been known to contribute in the slightest degree to the welfare of native dramatic art.

"Discoverers" of this sort are always fond of noisily celebrating the talents of some mummer who plays in an ill-smelling East Side theatre, speaking a language which they do not understand; but not one of them ever speaks a word of encouragement or raises a hand in behalf of the worthy young men and women who are working hard in the cheap variety houses doing their best to learn the entertainer's art and to lift themselves to a decent position in the popular esteem. Not a season passes that does not see the rise of some quick-witted, nimble-footed performer from the variety stage into the bright white light of fame, but in no case that I ever heard of did any member of the "fashionable, intellectual set" give so much as a God-speed to a flight prompted by such a worthy ambition.

Fortunately for our stage it is not dependent upon the whims of a handful of calf worshipers; but in other forms of art their influence has been simply deplorable. I know of no more pitiable history than that of the little artist colonies which are to be found in nearly every one of our cities, fighting gallantly against poverty, public indifference and snobbery. It is only those who, like myself, have seen the threadbare artist seated in a fireless studio, in the midst of pictures that are certain to bring their price in the years to come, who really know how pitiful that history is. For not until he is dead and unable to spend money can an American artist earn it from the hands of his calf-worshiping countrymen, unless, of course, he can first make a reputation abroad.

The story of American art is indeed a pitiful one, but it is not sordid and disgusting, like that of portrait painting, as it is practiced here by foreign craftsmen with the aid of adroit and conscienceless picture dealers, to whom they indenture themselves before leaving their own shores, and the meretricious puffery which they receive at the hands of a band of shameless artistic Jenkinses. Once more let me give emphasis to the fact that I have not a word to say against any artist of true distinction who may choose to honor us by his presence. My remarks are merely intended for those charlatans who are only too glad to divide their spoils with the picture dealer.

This artistic snobbishness is, however, a matter of but little consequence in comparison with the interest in and idolatry of foreign rank and title which have grown to such enormous proportions during the past quarter of a century and which culminate now and then in an outburst of hysterical Voodoo worship of such volume and intensity that it causes the cheeks of the earnest philosopher to grow pale with apprehension.

In a simpler and elder day, rank and title played no part whatever in American life, except in so much as they figured in the weekly story papers and cheap novels. I can remember only two varieties of noblemen in the fiction of that period, and it would be hard to say which of the two enjoyed the higher rank in the popular heart. One of these was the English lord who always wore long whiskers and spoke with an impossible drawl, and the other was the Latin noble—count, duke or baron—who had dark, melting and mysterious eyes and a long black mustache, and looked not unlike the generally accepted bucolic ideal of a bunco-steerer. These titled heroes figured in the foolish day-dreams of the young women who read about them in the Ledger and Waverley, but they were at best remote and inaccessible stars, the creatures of some distant and intangible world.

Nowadays, however, the New York papers give as much space to the "bags" made on the Yorkshire moors on the twelfth of August as do the leading provincial papers of England, while the list of presentations at the King's court causes almost as many heart-burnings and tears in Fifth Avenue as in Mayfair.

We all remember the frenzy of calf worship which marked the visit of a German Prince to our shores. Among those who noted with shrewd business eye the genuflections of the worshipers was a certain opera manager who had had many years' experience with the tiara-crowned goddesses of the brazen calf faith, opulent males of their species, and the vast army of the devout that follow at their heels; and this man straightway turned all his knowledge and experience to practical account by giving a "grand gala performance" in honor of the visitor. Highly as I esteem those clear-headed, energetic and progressive men who harnessed Niagara Falls and converted that one-time hackmen's paradise into an electric giant-of-all-work, I have a far greater reverence for the man who welded together the latent particles of snobbery in the town and by an alchemy of his own transformed the whole mass into gold. I am told that the very moment this sagacious manager knew to a certainty that the Prince was to attend a performance of opera in his house he went out to look at real estate, and selected for himself a home which he afterward paid for out of the profits of that one night of unbridled American snobbery.

"WE DON'T MAKE FANCY DRESSES 'ERE, SIR"

Many years ago, when the king of the Sandwich Islands honored us with a visit, P. T. Barnum induced him to ride with him in his carriage around the tan-bark arena of his "greatest show on earth," and everybody said what a clever man Barnum was. Nor does our respect for the old showman decrease when we consider the comparatively slender stock of snobbery which he had to work on in those simpler days. I wonder what Barnum would have done had he been on earth and in the show business at the time of this royal visit. Probably he would have gone out to look at blocks of real estate instead of single houses.

While we are on the subject of foreign snobbery it may be worth our while to consider the manner in which some of our distinguished citizens are regarded in that country which is the Mecca of all snobbery. And in so doing it may be well to differentiate between real snobbery—the mean admiration of mean things—and the sort of social success of which any man might well be proud and which is consequently the subject of the cheap jeers of the illiterate and the envious. For the unthinking pack is always ready to brand as a snob any man whose good fortune it is to be well received by that admirable but limited class of Britons who are fit company for a good American, though the same man might sit at the board of the Russian Czar or become the confidential friend of the King of Italy without danger of rebuke.

And yet, in spite of this generally accepted belief to the contrary, I know of no social hunting-ground in which the American snob fares so badly or the self-respecting American gentleman so well as in those well-guarded, enviously-eyed preserves of English society. And in saying this I must be modest enough to add that I am speaking not from extended personal experience but from a knowledge gained from those having the voice of authority. I am perfectly well aware that my statement will be contested by a great many who will back up their assertions by relating what happened at Lord So-and-So's or how insolent Lady Thing-'em-bob was at the garden party. As to arguments of this sort I have only to say that I cannot open a kindergarten to teach people that, in a round-up of "right Englishmen," titles cut about as little ice as they would in Heaven—a lesson which Burns tried to inculcate over a century ago and in far nobler language than I have at my command.

In his famous book on New York society Mr. Ward McAllister told the world the artless story of his visit to Windsor. It was from his own pen that the aristocracy, which Simon Barshfield rallied about the verbal banner raised by this distinguished author and dictator of fashion, and which David, the third of the royal line, has helped to maintain in the public esteem for a not unselfish purpose, first learned of his dinner with the Queen's cook at the village inn.

That Mr. McAllister dined with the Queen's cook and afterward gave publicity to that fact redounds very much to his credit and shows him to have been a man who properly respected a noble art and its artists. Certainly it is but a cheap and false wit that can find food for ridicule in his so doing. But let us hearken to what he says about the royal dining-table, of which he obtained a glimpse—thanks to the courtesy of the cook—through the pantry window:

"I have seen Her Majesty's table at Windsor Castle all ready for her. I have heard her footmen, in green and gold, reëcho from hall to kitchen the note that 'dinner is served,' and then I was told to go."

What should we say to a leader of the society of London or Berlin or Paris who was glad of a chance to peek through the window of the dining-room in the White House that he might chronicle the fact that the President had two kinds of pie for dinner?

Another American of social distinction was not quite so well received as Mr. McAllister and met with a rebuff which would have been extremely mortifying to almost any one else. On one of his visits to London this gentleman found himself in need of a court dress—or, to speak more correctly, had reason to hope that a favoring tide of circumstances would provide him with a long-sought opportunity to wear one. The excellent and well-known firm of Snips & Sheers, tailors by special appointment to His Majesty the King, was recommended to him, and by a fortunate chance I happened to be in their shop—they sell other things besides court dress—when he made his appearance.

Now, of course, I do not presume to say that a gentleman as much sought after as this one is lacking in personal distinction or that his face is not chiseled after the accepted aristocratic mould. I will say, however, that if he were to attempt to pass himself off as the missing Dauphin of France he would find it easier to carry out the deception in New York than in the Faubourg Saint Germain. This gentleman, whose name figures constantly in the chronicles of our fashionable life, and whose exalted rank in the Four Hundred has never been disputed at Mrs. Catnip's table, entered the shop and asked to be measured for a court costume.

It was Mr. Sheers himself who waited on him, and for once that usually astute tradesman deceived himself most woefully. Knowing that the masquerade ball of the haberdashers' young men was looming up on the social horizon, he replied haughtily: "We don't make fancy dresses 'ere, sir. I believe there's a shop in Leicester Square where they rent all sorts of masquerade costumes an' such like. We only make court costumes for gentlemen to wear to court, sir."

With these words he turned on his heel and walked away, and behold! we had another grudge against the sort of Englishman that we are so fond of imitating.

Another story which I will relate is one which proved highly pleasing to "right" Englishmen and women when it was repeated from house to house in London not many years ago, and it is worth retelling here because the woman who figures in it has been greatly admired by those who do not even know her name for the part which she plays in it. The episode in which this woman figures dates from the time, not many years ago, when a certain English duke was a very much sought after personage in New York society. This duke, contemptuously noting the eagerness with which New Yorkers fawned upon him, had formed the habit—not uncommon among men of his rank—of going out to dinner without troubling himself to put on evening dress. The lady of whom I write had invited him to dinner without knowing of this peculiarity, and was awaiting his arrival when her butler opened the door and cast a glance at her over the heads of intervening guests which said plainly that something was wrong. She hastened into the hall to find the duke standing there clad in the checked sack suit and flaming red tie which had seemed to him "good enough" for a dinner-party of American calf worshipers. This woman, however, had presence of mind, and she advanced upon him, radiant and smiling.

"No," she said decisively as she took him by the hand, "I won't accept any excuses. You've come round to tell me why it is that you can't dine here to-night and it's ever so much nicer of you to do that than just to send a note. The dinner's a little late and you've just time to go home and dress and be back here again before we begin."

The nobleman opened his mouth to reply, but his hostess shut him off in a second: "No, you needn't make any explanations or excuses. There are three women here who are dying to meet you and you must come back. Remember, you've only twenty minutes, so you must hurry!" And a moment later the astounded duke found himself hurrying toward his hotel and perhaps wondering what new social force it was that was impelling him in that direction.

CHAPTER III

THE day was the regular one for the meeting of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and there was a full attendance, every member being prompt except the chairman. Ten minutes after the hour struck Crane entered. It was almost impossible for a man to have had the personal triumph he had enjoyed the day before without showing some consciousness of it. Thorndyke had expected to see Crane crowing like a chanticleer. Instead, he was remarkably quiet and subdued. He was greeted with the chaff which Senators and Representatives indulge in after the manner of collegians. Several members addressed him as the "Wondrous Boy," and others, displaying copies of the Indianapolis editorial, presented their claims to him for Cabinet places and embassies. One member—the Honorable Mark Antony Hudgins, of Texas, a colleague of Crane, who posed as a greenhorn and was really a wit—solemnly engaged Thorndyke to write him a speech to deliver at the first seasonable opportunity, but warned him not to make it too much like the speech of the "Wondrous Boy." Thorndyke laughed. He had taken no part in the joking and chaffing. Crane's face flushed. He did not like to be reminded of Thorndyke's share in his success, but he was too considerable a man to deny it.

The meeting was brief and devoted to routine matters. The debate would begin directly after the morning hour, and it was supposed it would go along smoothly. There was, it is true, an able and malevolent person from Massachusetts who would be likely to stick a knife between the joints of Crane's armor, and two or three Southern members who would be certain to discover an infringement of the Constitution of the United States in something or other—but these were only the expected rough spots in an otherwise smooth road.

At two o'clock the debate began. Again were the galleries packed, though not to the same degree as on the day before. When Crane rose to defend the report he was loudly applauded. He was interrupted once or twice by the able and malevolent Representative from Massachusetts, who never disappointed expectations in that particular. And there were some sly allusions to the Indianapolis newspaper and the "Wondrous Boy." This bothered Crane obviously, who had a reasonable and wholesome fear of ridicule. He had his share of a certain crude humor—God never makes an American without putting humor of some sort into him—but Crane's was not the rapid-fire, give-and-take humor which counts in debate. He was always afraid of committing some breach of taste and decorum when he wished to raise a laugh. He remembered certain men whose remarks had caused a tempest of mirth in the House, but those same remarks seen in cold type next day had seriously damaged their authors. It was here that Thorndyke came to Crane's rescue. While he sat glowering and fuming and hesitating, Thorndyke stood in the breach with a good story, full of wit and pith. The House immediately went into convulsions of laughter. The able and malevolent member from Massachusetts in vain tried to bring gentlemen back to a state of seriousness and disgust with affairs generally. But the turn injected by Thorndyke into the discussion put everybody into a good humor, the debate went swimmingly, as it was foreseen, and when the adjournment came it was plain that the report would be adopted substantially as it came from the committee.

Thorndyke watched the big clock over the Speaker's chair and precisely at four left the chamber, and likewise left Crane to his fate, which, however, proved to be easy enough. Thorndyke had other business on hand then.

When he got out-of-doors the bright morning had changed into a cold, determined downpour of rain. The gray mists hung over the city at the foot of the hill, and the summit of the Washington Monument was obscured by sullen driving clouds. Thorndyke's spirits rose as he surveyed the gloomy prospect. It was not much of an afternoon for visiting—he should find Constance alone.

He went to his rooms, dressed, and before five was at Constance Maitland's door. The afternoon had grown worse. A sad northeast wind had been added to the rain; the lilac bushes in the little lawn at the side of the house drooped forlornly, and the dejected syringas looked like young ladies caught out in the rain in their ball gowns.

The rain, the cold and the wind outside was the best possible foil for the fire-lighted and flower-scented drawing-room, into which the young negro butler ushered Thorndyke. The walls were of the delicate pale green of the sea—the rug on the polished floor was of the green of the moss. A wood fire danced and sang in a white-tiled fireplace, and laughed at its reflection in the quaint mirrors about the room, and glowed upon family portraits and miniatures on the walls. There were many old-fashioned chairs and tables, and a deep, deep sofa drawn up to the fire. By its side was a tea-table gleaming with antique silver.

Like most men, Thorndyke was highly susceptible to the environment of women without being in the least able to analyze the feeling. It takes a woman to dissect an emotion thoroughly. He became at once conscious that this quaint, pretty, sparkling drawing-room was a home, and that what was in it had no connection whatever with shops for antiques and art sales catalogues. He had often noticed with dislike the spurious antiquity of many modern drawing-rooms, which are really museums, and represent the desire of the new for the old. But Constance Maitland had inherited the furnishings which made her drawing-room beautiful and distinctive, and in process of use, especially by one family, chairs and tables and tea-kettles acquire a semi-humanity which creates that subtle and enduring thing called atmosphere. The portraits on the walls gave an inhabited look to the room—it was never without company.

While Thorndyke was considering the curious fact that all the mere money in the world could not create a drawing-room like Constance Maitland's, she herself entered the room with her slow, graceful step. She wore a gown of a delicate gray color, which trailed upon the floor, and at her breast was a knot of pale yellow cowslips. A bowl of the same old-fashioned flowers was on the tea-table.

Thorndyke had never been able to contemplate without agitation a meeting with Constance Maitland. But, as on the two previous occasions, so soon as he came face to face with her nothing seemed easier, sweeter, more natural than that they should meet. He placed a chair for her, and they exchanged smilingly the commonplaces of meeting and greeting. At once Thorndyke felt that delicious sense of comfort, security and well-being which some women can impart so exquisitely in their own homes. The quiet, fire-lighted room seemed a paradise of peace and rest, which was accentuated by the northeast storm without. The surety that he would have the room, the fire, the sweet company of Constance Maitland to himself made Thorndyke feel almost as if he had a place there. And Constance, by not taking too much notice of him, increased the dear illusion. She got into a spirited discussion with the negro butler who rejoiced in the good old-time name of Scipio, to which Constance had added Africanus. Scipio had his notions of how tea should be made, which were at variance with his mistress's. After the manner of his race, he proceeded to argue the point. Constance entered with spirit into the controversy, and only settled it by informing Scipio that where tea was concerned he was, and always would be, an idiot, at which Scipio grinned in a superior manner as he departed. Thorndyke thought Scipio in the right, and said so, as he drank a very good cup of tea.

"But I can never let Scipio believe for a moment that I am in the wrong about anything," replied Constance with thoughtful determination. "You dear, good Northern people never can be made to understand that with a negro everything depends on the personal equation. He is not, and never can be made, a human machine. He is a personality, and his usefulness depends entirely on the recognition of that personality."

"The commonly accepted idea of a servant is a human machine," said Thorndyke, willing to champion Scipio's cause for the purpose of seeing Constance Maitland's soft eyes glow and sweet voice quicken in discussion. In the old days they had many hot wrangles over the North and the South.

"Ah, if you had been served by human machines for eighteen years, as I was, you would understand how I longed to see an honest, laughing black face once more! My negro servants do much toward making this house a home for me. You would laugh at the way we get on together. When I am in an ill humor they must bear the brunt of it. I am a terrible scold when I am cross. But when the servants are lazy and neglectful then I bear with them like an angel, and so we hit it off comfortably together. Even Scipio Africanus, who is altogether idle and irresponsible, becomes a hero when I am ill and a gentleman when I am angry."

"Another cup of tea, please."

"Already? You will become a tea drinker like Doctor Johnson. However, my tea is so good that you are excused."

The conversation went on fitfully but to Thorndyke delightfully. Like all women who truly know the world, Constance had a charming and real simplicity about her. She made no effort to entertain him; she talked to him and he replied, or was silent, according to his mood. Every moment increased Thorndyke's sense of exquisite comfort and quiet enjoyment. He had reached the inevitable stage of life when amusements are no longer warranted to amuse; when only a few things remained, such as certain books and certain conversations, which were a surety of pleasure. Nor had it been much in his way to enjoy those simple pleasures which are found only in quiet and seclusion. It was as much a feeling of gratitude as of pleasure which made him say to Constance:

WHO REJOICED IN THE GOOD OLD-TIME NAME OF SCIPIO

"I did not think there remained for me such an hour of rest and refreshment as you have given me."

Constance turned toward him her eyes, pensive but not sad. There was something soothing in her very presence. She had known and suffered much, and had led a life far from serene, and now, in her maturity, she had reached, it seemed to her, a haven of peace and quiet. She had acquired a knowledge worth almost as much as youth itself—the knowledge that never again could she suffer as she had once suffered. And the meeting with Thorndyke had confirmed her in a belief that had been her chief solace under the sorrows of her life of exile and disappointment. She knew then, that he loved her well. For some years of her youth she had been haunted by the thought, cruel to her pride, that Thorndyke, after all, had been only playing at love. But as time went on, and she knew herself and others better, she had become convinced that Thorndyke had truly loved her, and his leaving her was only what any other man of honor burdened with poverty would have done. And he had remembered and suffered, too. As this thought came into her mind Thorndyke made some little remark that referred vaguely to their past, something about a song from one of the Italian operas, those simple love stories told in lyrics which she had often sung in the old days. A blush swept over Constance's cheek, and after a little pause of silence and hesitation she went to the piano and sang the quaint old song. She had a pleasing although not a brilliant voice, and her singing was full of sweetness and feeling, the only kind of singing which the normal man understands.

When she returned to her chair Thorndyke leaned toward her with eyes that told her he loved her, although he did not utter a word. Constance, in turn, resting her rounded chin on her hand, leaned toward him with a heavenly smile upon her face—the smile a woman only bestows on the man she loves. Even if he could never speak his love she was conscious of it, and that was enough for her woman's heart. Under the spell of her eyes and smile Thorndyke felt himself losing his head—how could he refrain from touching the soft white hand which hung so temptingly near him!

"Mr. Crane," announced Scipio Africanus, and Julian Crane walked in.

Every man receives a shock when he finds he has interrupted a tête-à-tête, and Crane's shock was augmented by finding that Thorndyke was the victim in the present case. Thorndyke had not said a word about going to see Miss Maitland and Crane had meant to do a magnanimous thing in taking him there! And while outside the door he had heard Constance singing to the piano. She had never mentioned to him that she had such an accomplishment.

Thorndyke behaved as men usually do under the circumstances. He spoke to Crane curtly, assumed an injured air, and took his leave promptly, as much as to say:

"It is impossible for me to stand this man a moment."

Constance, womanlike, showed perfect composure and politeness, bade Thorndyke good-by with a smile, and then, by an effort, brought herself to the contemplation of Julian Crane. She saw then that he was very pale, and the hand which he rested on the back of a chair was trembling. The first idea which occurred to her was that Crane had heard bad news; but she could not understand why he should come to her under the circumstances. Perhaps it was only nervousness, the relaxation after great tension. With this in mind she said pleasantly as they seated themselves:

"So you waked this morning and found yourself famous."

"My speech appears to have been well received by the country," replied Crane in a strained voice, after a pause.

"It is a pity Mrs. Crane was not present to enjoy your triumph," she said.

"Mrs. Crane does not care for politics," replied Crane, still in a strange voice.

"I can't say that I am deeply interested in politics," replied Constance, "but I am interested in contemporary history of all sorts."

"And interested in your friends, Miss Maitland, when they are in public life."

"Extremely. I was at the House yesterday to hear you speak, and read your speech over again this morning in the Congressional Record."

"Which, no doubt, you received through Thorndyke," Crane answered pointedly, after a moment.

Constance felt an inclination to get up and leave the room, as she often did when Crane was talking with her. He had no reserves or restraints, and said just what was in his mind—a dangerous and alarming practice. She controlled herself, however, and looked closer at Crane. He was evidently deeply agitated, and Constance forebore the rebuke that she was ready to speak. Like a true woman, to feel sorry for a man was to forgive him everything. Suddenly Crane burst out:

"Have you heard the news? Senator Brand—our junior Senator—was run over by a train at Baltimore this morning, and died within an hour."

There is a way of announcing a death which shows that the speaker is contemplating the dead man's shoes with particular interest. Without fully taking in what it meant to Crane and what he wished to convey, Constance at once saw that in Senator Brand's death lay some possible great good for Crane. She remained silent a minute or two, her mind involuntarily reconstructing the horror and pity of the dead man's taking off.

Crane rose and walked up and down, his face working.

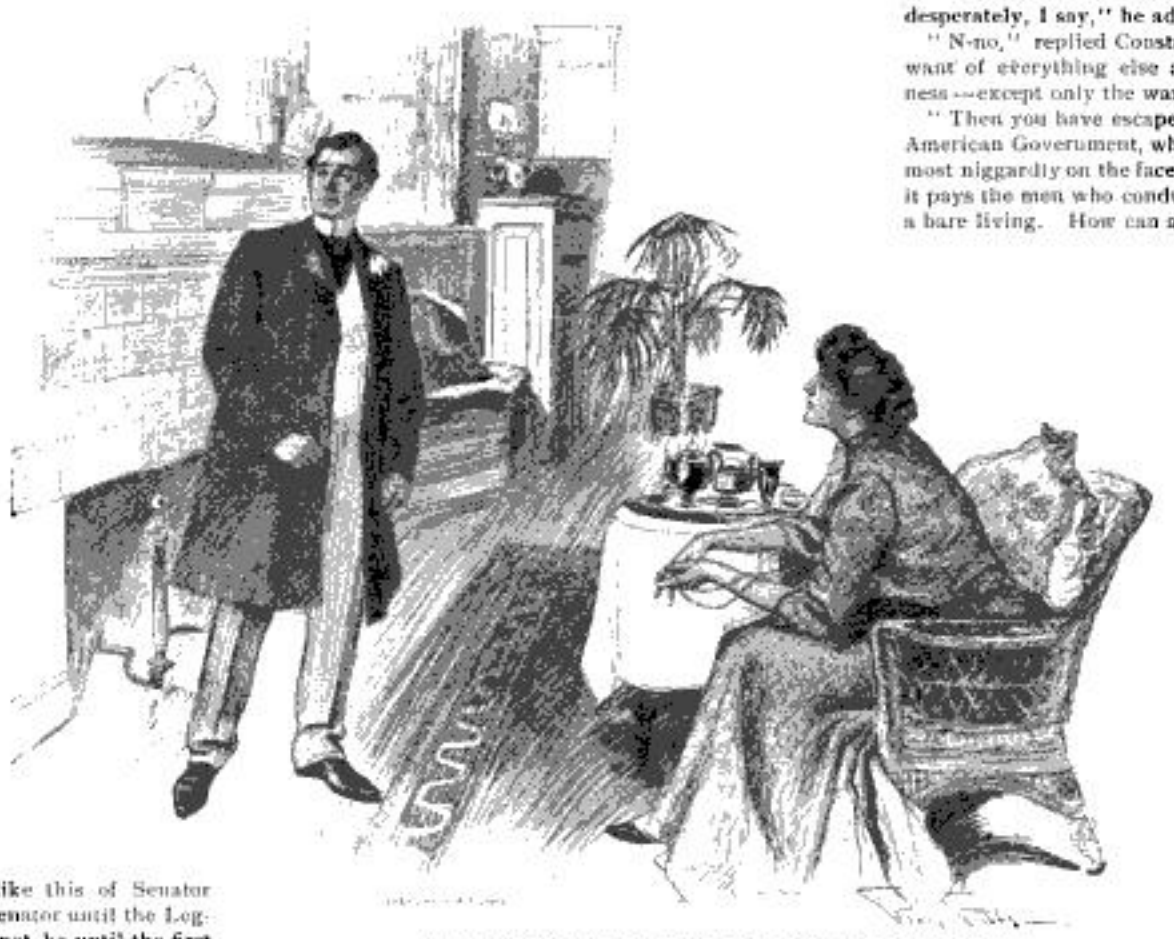
"I have committed a great, a stupendous folly," he said. "At the very outset of my real career I may have ruined it. I couldn't describe to you what I have suffered this day—yet no one has suspected it. I felt the necessity for sympathy, the necessity to tell my story to some one, and I came to you. I know I have no right to do it—but it seems to me, Constance, that ever since the day I first saw you you have had some strange power of sustaining and comforting me."

As Crane spoke her name Constance involuntarily rose and assumed an air of offended dignity. But Crane's distress was so real, his offense so unconscious that her indignation could not hold against him.

Without noticing her offended silence he came and sat down heavily in the chair that Thorndyke had just vacated.

"You know," he said, "in cases like this of Senator Brand's death the Governor appoints a Senator until the Legislature meets and can elect, which will not be until the first of next January. Just as I had heard the news about poor Brand at my hotel I ran into Sanders, our Governor. I didn't know he was in Washington. Sanders is a brute—always thinking of himself first. He buttonholed me, took me into his bedroom, locked the door and closed the transom. There were three other men present—all of whom I should not wish to offend. One of them has indorsed two unpaid notes for me. Sanders told me he had been looking for me, and with these other fellows—practical politicians every one of them—had already formulated a plan of campaign. The Governor would appoint me to fill the vacancy until the Legislature met in January and elected a Senator for the short term, provided I would give him a clear track then. In further recompense, he agreed to support me for the long term—the election is only two years off. Sanders has had the Senatorial bee in his bonnet for a long time, but the State organization is not over kindly to him, and Senator Bicknell is a little bit afraid of him, and naturally wouldn't encourage his aspirations. And do you know, after an hour's talk I allowed Sanders and those three fellows to wheedle me into that arrangement—and that without consulting Thorndyke, or a single friend I have in the world! Sanders is a long-headed rascal, and he knew very well that I was under money obligations to those men, and among them, aided and abetted by my own folly, I was buncoed—yes, regularly buncoed."

The rage and shame that possessed him seemed to overpower Crane for a moment, and he covered his face with his hands. Then he dashed them down and continued:



"Of course, I could have made a good showing in the race in January, and after my success of yesterday I believe I could have won. Senator Bicknell is not by any means the czar in the State which he would wish people to believe. But because Sanders dangled before my eyes the bauble of the appointment to the Senate—a present mess of pottage—and because I owed money I could not pay, I gave up the finest prospect of success any man of my age has had for forty years. Who ever heard of a stop-gap Senator that amounted to a bag of nails! And talking about two years from now, when I have just thrown away the game!"

Crane struck the arm of his chair with his clenched fist. His furious and sombre eyes showed the agony of his disappointment.

"As soon as it was done I knew my folly, and since then I have been almost like a madman. I went to my room to recover myself before going to the Capitol and managed not to betray myself while I was there. But I couldn't stand the strain until adjournment; I had to come to you."

Constance sat looking at him; pity, annoyance and a kind of disgust struggled within her. This, then, was politics. Accomplished woman of the world that she was, this natural and untutored man thoroughly disconcerted her. If only she had not felt such pity for him! And while she was contemplating the spectacle of these elemental passions of hatred, disappointment, revenge and self-seeking, Crane's eyes, fixed on her, lost some of their fury, and became more melancholy than angry, and he continued, as if thinking aloud:

"Suddenly I felt the desire to see you. You would know how insane was my folly, but you would not despise me for it. That's the greatest power in the world a woman has over a man: when he can show her all his heart, and she will pity him, without scorn or contempt. Ah, if Fate had given me a wife like you I could have reached the heights of greatness!"

"I HAVE COMMITTED A GREAT, A STUPENDOUS FOLLY"

At those words Constance Maitland moved a little closer to him so that she could bring him under the full effect of her large, clear gaze.

"I think," she said in a cool, soft voice, with a rebuke in it, but without contempt, "that you are forgetting yourself strangely. I have often noticed in you a want of reticence. You should begin now to cultivate reticence. What you have just said has in it something insulting to me as well as to your wife—a person you seem to have forgotten. As for the political arrangement which you regret so much, I can only say that it seems to me to have been cold-blooded and unfeeling on both sides to a remarkable degree. You have spoken plainly; I speak plainly."

Constance leaned back quietly in her chair to watch the effect of what she had said. She felt then a hundred years older than Crane, who was older than she, and who knew both law and politics well, but was a child in the science of knowing the world and the people in it—a science in which Constance Maitland excelled. But even her rebuke had a fascination for him. No other woman had ever rebuked him—his wife least of all.

"Do you complain of me," he said, "for telling you my weaknesses, my misfortunes? Don't you see that what you have just told me is proof of all I have said? You see my faults, you tell me of them, you inspire me with a desire to correct them. No other woman ever did so much for me. Is it forbidden to any one to utter a regret?"

"Very often it is forbidden," replied Constance promptly. "Unavailing regrets are among the most undignified things on earth. Is it possible that you have lived past your fortieth birthday without getting rid of that schoolboy idea that our environment makes us—that a man is made by his wife, or by any other human agent except himself? So long as self-love is the master passion, so long shall we heed our own persuasions more than any one else's."

"I hardly think you understand how things are with me," replied Crane, his eyes again growing sombre. "Yesterday was an epoch-making day with me. To-day, the first of the new epoch, I make a hideous mistake. It unmans me; it unnerves me. Not often do two such catastrophes befall a man together. I follow an impulse and come to you, and you are angry with me. Bah! How narrow and conventional are women, after all! Nevertheless," he kept on, rising to his feet and suddenly throwing aside his dejection, "no man ever yet rose to greatness without making vast mistakes and retrieving them. This moment the way of retrieving my mistake has come to me. I will go to Sanders—no, I will write and keep a certified copy of the letter—saying that I shall withdraw from my engagements with him. I will refuse to accept of the appointment as Senator and will contest the election with him before the Legislature. But—but—if only the man who indorsed my notes hadn't been in the combine!"

As suddenly as he had rallied Crane again sank into dejection.

"You don't know what it is to want money desperately—desperately, I say," he added.

"N-no," replied Constance slowly. "I think I know the want of everything else almost which is necessary to happiness—except only the want of money."

"Then you have escaped hell itself, Miss Maitland. This American Government, which you think so impeccable, is the most niggardly on the face of the globe. With untold wealth, it pays the men who conduct its affairs a miserable pittance—a bare living. How can a man give his whole mind to great governmental and economic problems when nine out of ten public men owe more than they can pay? I owe more than I can pay, and I owe, besides, a host of obligations of all sorts which the borrower of money, especially if he is a public man, cannot escape."

Constance, at this, felt more real pity and sympathy for Crane than she had yet felt. Women, being in the main intensely practical and in their own singular way more material than men, the want of money always appeals to them. And she had an income much greater than her wants—that is, unless she happened to want an American husband. Every other luxury was within her reach. This idea occurred to her grotesquely enough at the moment. She said after a moment's pause:

"It seems to me that to make your disentanglement complete, you should, if possible, pay your debt to the man that you say helped to wheedle you into the arrangement. You might easily borrow the money—it is probably not a large sum. If—if—perhaps Mr. Thorndyke—might arrange——"

Crane instantly divined the generous thought in Constance Maitland's heart.

"No," he said. "I know what you would do—through Thorndyke. But it is not to be thought of. With all my shortcomings, I can't think of borrowing money from a woman. But your suggestion is admirable—the payment of the money is necessary. It is not much."

Crane named something under a thousand dollars.

"Mr. Crane," said Constance after a while, "what advice do you think your wife would give you as to that money?"

If the Great "Merger" Stands

A GENERATION ago a daring speculator cast about for some way firmly to establish himself where he could get caste as a "financier." There was a great railway system which was in the possession of the heavy-witted sons of the men who had projected and built it. The speculator swooped upon the sleeping sons, bought control and bore off the prize amid wild shrieks of "Adventurer! Robber! Swindler!" With that "grab" as his foundation he became "eminently respectable," a "bulwark of conservatism," a "right arm of stability."

A generation passed and along came another daring speculator. He found that this railway system had passed into the hands of the descendants of the deceased "right arm of stability." And they were asleep, and off he made with the railway amid cries that were an exact repetition of the shouts of a generation before.

The moral to this tale is: Whatever may be the price of getting millions, eternal vigilance is the price of keeping them.

But this is the condition of affairs which Mr. Morgan and his multi-millionaire associates and lieutenants wish to see abolished. By the fiercest kind of competition they rose. Now that they have reached the climax of financial power, have got all there was to be got out of the competitive principle, they wish to abolish it in order that they may sit secure, unafraid of audacious raiders who might otherwise disturb and dispossess them—or their heirs. Having completed their conquest they cry "Peace! Peace!"

More interesting even than this call for disarmament from the victorious conquerors is the method by which they purpose to establish a peace in which orders may flow out from them to be everywhere obeyed, and dividends may flow in upon them in ever increasing rivers. The Assistant Attorney-General, Mr. Beck, lucidly described this method in his brief on the Northern Securities Company—the greatest, though not the most heavily capitalized, of Mr. Morgan's "peace" measures. Mr. Beck showed that this "merger" was:

First, of unlimited duration.

Second, of unlimited power to engage in any and every kind of enterprise.

Third, of such inviolable secrecy that only the "inside ring" could ever find out anything about the affairs of the "combine" and its constituent companies.

Fourth, of such curious construction that directors owning only a small part of the stock could assign to two men, who might own almost no stock at all, absolute power to do what they pleased without consulting anybody or without regard to the interests of the "combine" or its real owners.

Now, if Mr. Morgan were going to live forever, or if he could transmit his power, his purposes and his brains by some sort of hereditary arrangement that would be held sacred by everybody, then this scheme might be regarded as sound—though it is difficult to conceive of any circumstances in which it could be regarded as a good scheme for anybody but Mr. Morgan and those in favor with him. But as Mr. Morgan is not going to live forever and has not been anointed with the holy oil of kings, how is it possible to consider this scheme as anything but a standing invitation to the most unscrupulous kind of wrecker who need only wait until lazy or thick-headed sons are in possession? Under the present system the wrecker was, and is, forced to turn conserver because he has to invest his fortune in the property before he can get control of it. Under the "merger" system the wrecker need invest nothing but his wits, and the only way he could make anything would be by impairing the property and ruining its owners.

Socialists, philosophical anarchists and the like are often laughed at as short-sighted and visionary. Are their visions any wilder than such dreaming of peace and stability and status quo preserved? If the Supreme Court should reverse the Circuit Court and decide that there is no legal bar to the operations of the new breed of plutocratic socialist-dreamers, would it not be a mercy to them to pass a law that would compel them to keep to the ways which the example of nature and the experience of the race through the centuries mark out?

In their old age these men, and after their death their children, might hope to hold on to at least something under the competitive system. Under this system of their devising only the forbearance of rogues and "rustlers" would save them or their estates from spoliation.

The Revival of a Lost Art

WE HEAR constantly that letter writing is a lost art and that it does not belong to the rush and terseness of these modern days. There is no time for long epistles, and the polite pen is in the bottom of the hair-covered trunk or on the dusty shelf of the museum.

But is it? The other day the head of a great concern gazed at an expanse of sheets on the big flat desk before him. Quickly but unerringly he flipped the sheets away until a half-dozen remained. "Neatness," he said laconically. Then he carefully read the six and made his final selection. "A very excellent letter," he declared; "well written, aptly phrased, correctly punctuated and altogether attractive." And the writer of that letter received an appointment that meant not only opportunity but liberal compensation.

Big men are so busy they do not bother about letters, say many. Wrong again. Here is proof of recent occurrence: A boy of less than a dozen years has been trained in letter writing; he is rewarded for his good work; he takes pride in it; he tried on his own account an interesting test; he wrote to several men of world-wide reputation, and the first two replies that came were from J. Pierpont Morgan and Andrew Carnegie. Last year a young man wanted the opinion of one of the busiest men in the country on a matter of interest to himself. He took pains with his inquiry. Promptly an answer was received and it began: "I am not able to reply to all the demands that are made upon me, but your letter is so admirably expressed that I am only too happy to make this an exception," and it went on to an interesting length and was signed by Abram H. Hewitt.

We have before us one of the publications devoted to the development of the South, especially to attracting the better class of settlers from other sections, and it contains a long article on courtesy in correspondence, meaning the money value of good letters. That man has the right idea. The polite letter is a power in immigration as well as in business. It has made whole counties rich; it has lifted the life and prosperity of communities.

In the mass excellence wins. There are millions of letters in every State. For the whole world the annual total is something over twenty billions. The number is beyond the imagination, but it keeps on growing hundreds of millions each year. You know how it is by your own correspondence and you also know how few of the letters you get make an impression upon you. A really good letter is a surprise, an enjoyment, a stimulus. You keep it almost as a curiosity.

A young man who can write a good letter has in that single ability a profitable resource. He is wanted in business, in politics, in journalism, in most of the higher callings. The letters need not be long but they should be neat, correct, attractive—and they should say something and say it out of the routine.

As Sure as Death and Taxes

IN ONE of our smaller cities the two most conspicuous citizens are:

First, a nonagenarian—he is ninety-six—who in look and activity is no older than the average man of sixty. All his life he has been a notorious violator of the laws of health.

Second, a multi-millionaire—he has at least ten millions—who in his private life, so far as it is known, and in the respect paid to him by the community, has all the advantages of having led an honest and honorable life. From the very outset of his career he has been a persistent and notorious violator of the laws of morality, even to those embodied in the penal code.

On one side of that city there is a graveyard. It is almost wholly tenanted by men and women who were cut off in or before the prime of life through trying to follow that nonagenarian's program for long life. On the opposite side, a few miles away, there is a penitentiary. It is filled, filled to overflowing, with men who have been sent there for trying to follow that multi-millionaire's program for success.

For every man who cheats the graveyard there are a thousand thousand who fail. For every man who cheats the jail there are a thousand thousand who fail.

He who sets out on a career of deliberate violation of law is a leader of the forlornest of forlorn hopes. No matter how conspicuous he may become through winning the long life or the prosperity he ought not to have won, he gets only a tithe of the conspicuousness he has earned. The miracle of his escape in running the gauntlet pales the miracles of Middle Ages justice in which persons walked unharmed on red-hot ploughshares.

And if there were a sort of court where the claims of candidates for fame as successful law-defiers were tested, probably only a very few of those who presented themselves would be accepted. For example, the hardy nonagenarian has been for thirty odd years a sufferer from chronic rheumatism, and at certain seasons he has many successive days of agony that are said to be horrible to contemplate. Chance visitors hear nothing of this rheumatism—though they always hear how the old man has never worn an overcoat and has always eaten and drunk what he pleased. In like manner, there may be facts in the case of the multi-millionaire which are not placarded on his palace doors. George Eliot never said anything more profound than "Consequences are unpitying." If private lives could be exposed, if history and biography could be rewritten in truth, if all the facts in any given case could be known instead of only the often misleading glimpses of a few facts which may not really be important, we might realize more clearly that the moral law is as capable to enforce itself as is the law which says, "If you put your fingers in the crack of a door and then shut it, your fingers will be pinched." Ten-table anticipations of the Day of Judgment may not be so wise or so just as they fancy themselves.

One of the great difficulties in the way of education in moral law is the same as the one that makes slow and painful education in physical law: human unwillingness to believe that every cause has an effect and every effect a cause. It is so much more comfortable and so much less troublesome to believe that things "just happen." Then the man who falls into difficulties can rail against his luck and save his vanity. "Hard luck" lost him his job or got him into the hospital or the jail. And the person who comes along with the cold, unsympathetic, brutal "cause and effect" theory is more dreadful than the doctor with his drugs or the jailer with his cell. For he cuts into the most sensitive part of the human organism—vanity.

The laws of the universe in their application to man are all of a piece, are all part of a general scheme of cause and effect, are all grounded in supreme common-sense. The healthy man, the successful man, the good man are simply persons who are perfectly adapted to their environment, as a fish is when it is in the water, or a polar bear when it is in regions of eternal ice, or a man when he wears an overcoat on a cold day or keeps his hands off his neighbor's goods.

PRESIDENTS THAT PUSH

THE REASONS FOR THEIR SUCCESS MADE CLEAR IN THE RECORD OF THEIR CAREERS

By Forrest Crissey

I—A. J. EARLING

AT THE mention of the "Golden Age of railroad building" the public mind reverts to the pioneer period of the West when the great transcontinental lines celebrated their completion with imposing ceremonies. The strokes that drove home each golden spike were heard by the whole nation and the people exclaimed: "Another mile-post in the history of American civilization!"

In strange contrast to the noise and enthusiasm of these celebrations is the present public indifference to the monster expenditures for the rebuilding and extension of the leading railways of the West—expenditures which make those of the pioneer days seem small by comparison! Very few persons outside of those best informed in railroad and financial circles are aware that, in the past three years, more millions of dollars—about three to one—have gone into permanent railway improvements in the "Great West" than were expended in an equal period in the palmiest days of the pioneer era of construction.

And by the same token, mention of the "kings of American railroad building" calls to mind, even with the younger generation, the names of Huntington, Stanford, Oakes Ames, Jay Cooke and Henry Villard, with scarcely a thought for the group of men who to-day are changing the map of this continent and writing a new chapter in the history of American commerce.

But these men are worth knowing and worth knowing about. Because the world of affairs has expanded to so vast a total, with interests so diversified, the doings of these men make far less noise and attract only a tithe of the public attention drawn by the achievements of the old-timers; but there is as much romance and inspiration in the careers of the quieter modern "kings of rail" as in those of the earlier time who stood in the limelight of popular attention when the West was young.

Most of these modern men are chief executives of the most progressive lines and systems spreading westward from Chicago; they have come up from the bottom and gained their mastery of railroad construction and management in the passage from the humblest and the intermediate to the highest steps of the service. What each of these men stands for in the modern railroad world, how he has arrived at his measure of influence and what are the lines along which he is working are matters of moment to those who keep pace with the vital elements in present-day progress.

President Earling a Veritable Glutton for Work

OF A. J. EARLING, President of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, it is often said: "No other president knows his road as Earling knows the St. Paul." This, however, is the view of the outsider, and a claim which the quiet head of this great organization would probably be first to repudiate were it brought to his attention. But the soundness of the observation can scarcely be questioned when it is stated that he entered the service of the St. Paul as a telegraph operator thirty-seven years ago and has ever since been continuously in its employ.

There is genuine inspiration to the ambitious young man in the humbler ranks of railroad work in the bare recital of the stages by which Mr. Earling has progressed to his present position. At the age of eighteen he was put on the pay-roll of the road he now serves as president. After six years of service as a station operator he was promoted to the train dispatcher's table at division headquarters. Here he remained for five years. His next advance was to the position of assistant division superintendent. Four years at this post brought him promotion to the division superintendent's desk, where he put in two years. Here he made a big jump ahead, being appointed assistant general superintendent. Another two years pushed him forward to the place of general superintendent. Still another two years were sufficient to see him advanced to the office of general manager, where he remained for nine years, during a portion of this period being also the second vice-president. Finally, in 1899, he reached the presidency of the road with which he had begun as telegraph operator.

In view of this remarkable record of continuous service, is the statement that he knows his road more intimately than any other road is known by its president to be questioned?

In the course of Mr. Earling's last seven years of service at the telegraph key he was actually on duty, so far as the dispatching of trains was concerned, for twenty-four hours a day and did not miss fifty days out of the whole period. Nothing can indicate better than this fact the completeness with which he has given himself to the road he now directs. During all the years in which he did train dispatching he had a telegraph instrument and a train sheet on a little table close beside his bed. A night operator attended to all other messages save the "orders" for the movement of trains. When a call of this kind came the wire leading to Mr. Earling's bedside was "plugged in." At the first click of the call he would swing himself from between the sheets, get the location of the trains on his line, dispatch the requisite orders, and then swing back into bed again and drop to sleep almost as quickly as he had awakened.

Although a strict disciplinarian, President Earling has been known to confess to friends that he once failed to hold a subordinate to the stern letter of the law. But the question of his justification for the leniency may safely be left to the reader on the statement of facts—a statement which is significant as not only showing the character of the man but also that of the service in which so many years of his life were spent.

Through one of those strange mental elisions which have contributed many a bloody chapter to the history of railroad wrecks, a night dispatcher on Mr. Earling's line gave conflicting orders involving the certainty of a head-end collision of a fast freight and a passenger train.

Only a few moments after he had given the orders the dispatcher discovered his terrible blunder. Both trains had left the last stations at which they could be reached with orders, and as the dispatcher realized that they could not be intercepted by human agency, a vision of the accident, of the dead, the maimed and the dying, flashed upon his mind with the distinctness of a stereoscopic view.

The Train Dispatcher's Prayer

IN AN agony of despair he "plugged in" upon the wire running to the private room of the chief dispatcher, to whom he clicked the message, "Come down at once." Then he started in to face the awful interval of waiting for the call for the "wrecker" that would come from the station nearest the fatal meeting-place of the trains.

From pacing the floor, the half-crazed dispatcher who had made the blunder suddenly wheeled about and passed into an adjoining room. There he threw himself upon his knees, and in an agony of prayer appealed to God mercifully to spare the doomed passengers and train crews from the fate which could only be averted by divine intervention.

Although not habitually a religious man, a strange composure took possession of him as he rose from his knees. Without analyzing his course he returned to the telegraph key, again called up the chief dispatcher and sent the message, "Don't come."

After a seeming eternity of suspense he heard the call from the operator at the station nearest the probable point of the wreck. He almost fell to the floor with faintness as he listened to the report: "Passed No. 46 on the siding." Although weak and spent from the sudden relaxation which this news of deliverance brought, he nerved himself, by almost superhuman effort, to pick up the run of his train sheet and issue orders for the movement of the trains. When the train which had taken the siding came into division headquarters and its conductor and engineer entered the dispatcher's room there was a moment of silence and an exchange of glances which told more than words. Then the engineer said:

"I'd just struck the long, straight stretch of track across the bottom, Jim, when I saw the flicker of a headlight coming. I pulled up with a jerk, reversed and backed for that siding faster than any train ever backed on this line. There was just time to throw the switch and pull in on the siding when that freight zipped past us at a fifty-mile clip. The back coach just barely cleared the main track in the nick of time. But all this is just between us."

There was no need of this pledge of secrecy, for the next day the dispatcher faced Mr. Earling and made a frank confession of the "lap order." His face, however, spoke of the awful sufferings of that night, for the agony of those few hours had added years to his age.

As he looked at the dispatcher's face and listened to his strange account of the answered prayer, Mr. Earling felt his sense of discipline dissolve in sympathy, and he replied:

"Under the rules you ought to be discharged at once, but the circumstances are peculiar. If the incident were known among other men, so that it would weaken the discipline of the road generally, we should have to let you go, but as it is you may go right ahead with your work as if nothing had happened."

When the dispatcher found his voice he answered:

"I'm much obliged, sir; but I shall never handle a train sheet again. That's my last order."

And so it was. At the dispatcher's request he was transferred to another department of the work. This episode was the basis of Frank H. Spearman's graphic story of The Last Order, and is one of the few incidents of President Earling's variation from the strictest line of discipline.

No better illustration of Mr. Earling's devotion to the interests of railroad men can be given than the fact that he declined to take out a patent on the "manual block system," of which he is the inventor, and which has been generally in use, for years, on many of the Western railroads. Knowing that it would greatly contribute to the safety of train operation, he desired that its adoption should be unhampered by the monopoly guaranteed by letters patent. Therefore he sacrificed his private interests and gave the railroads the free benefits of the invention.

Thoroughness and independence are perhaps the two most distinctive features of Mr. Earling's policy. In many important particulars his road has been a pacemaker in modern railroading. Since 1896 the St. Paul road has built all of its freight cars and its big shops have turned out an average of fully fifteen cars a day. This innovation has been so successful that the company is now preparing also to construct all the locomotives needed for the operation of its lines. At first these will be turned out at the rate of eight a month.

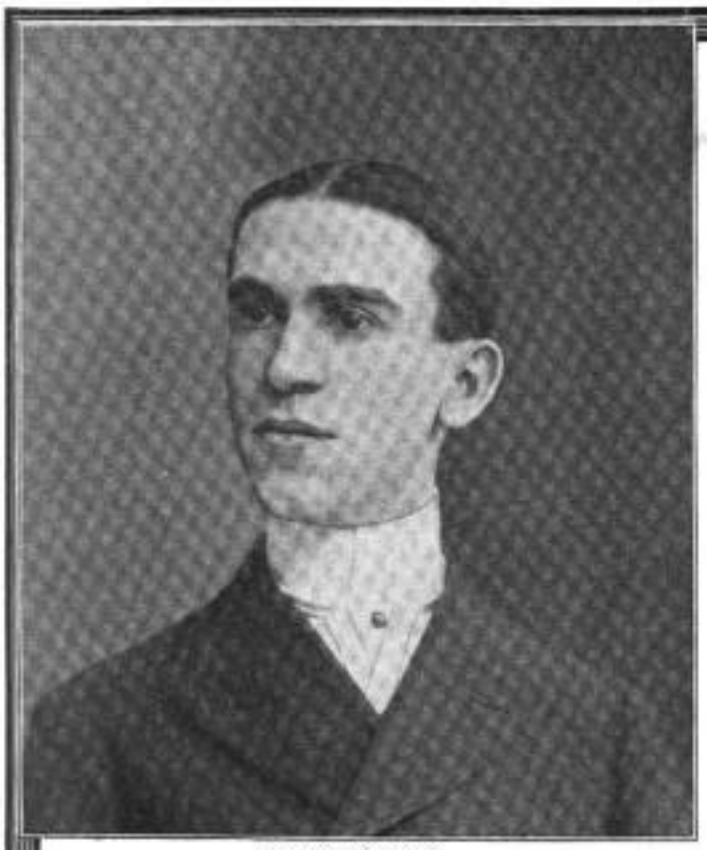
One-management control is a keynote in the St. Paul policy, and this great corporation has more miles of road under the control of one managensent than any other road in the world. Its administration believes in the policy of direct responsibility and simplicity of organization, and consequently has no subsidiary lines or companies, no "wheels within a wheel."

In theory and practice Mr. Earling holds that a high development of the territory through which a railroad runs is a fundamental obligation upon the company and that this obligation continues long after the territory has been developed into well-settled country. He is a firm believer in such expansion as is best calculated to strengthen the property and develop its immediate and adjacent territory.

His Office in His Hat

"WHEN I was elected to the Forty-seventh Congress," said Representative William P. Hepburn, of Iowa, "a good friend of mine, who had assisted in managing my campaign and knew the sentiment of the people in the Eighth Iowa District, said:

"'Hepburn, I've got only one piece of advice to give you, and that is: don't get the big head there in Washington and come back here with a high hat. Stick to your slouch, and your chances for reëlection are excellent.' Acting on his suggestion I shunned high hats and was sent to two Congresses.



"During the session of the Forty-ninth Congress, however, I was chosen with others to escort the body of a deceased member to San Francisco. As a mark of respect I wore a high hat with the rest of the conventional attire. On the way back, still wearing that hat, I stopped off at Iowa.

"'See here, Hepburn,' exclaimed my political adviser, 'that hat won't do. It'll ruin you here.'

"I ventured to believe that my constituents would not turn me down merely on account of the style of hat I wore. But I was woefully beaten at the next election.

"I promptly discarded my offending head-gear, and although it was too late to redeem my reputation for that year, I managed in time to live down my indiscretion and was reëlected to the Fifty-third Congress. Since then I have been honored by the confidence of my constituents and no occasion has tempted me to forswear the slouch hat."

LEARN ADVERTI

Many others are doing what this student has done

In a recent contest in New York our graduate was pronounced the best advertisement writer.

Some wonder why it is that the country boy can make a success in the commercial life—in the advertising world—and in the social whirl of a great city. They can see how a young chap may become a successful farmer, but that he should cut loose from his daily associations and training, and enter the arena of a Metropolitan city, without any certainty of success, baffles the ordinary person.

Now we have an example of prominence coming from the little city of Stroudsburg, Pa., and we expect to see him climb the ladder of prominence in the advertising field. He has chosen a profession where hard work, ambition and determination are rewarded and a business that pays a man while he is living and does not wait until he dies to bestow its riches.

The following clipping is from the Stroudsburg, Pa., Times:

Won the Laurels!

A most interesting contest in advertisement writing took place between M. L. Hallett, of Springfield, Mass., and H. D. Sanborn, of Elmira, N. Y., in which Mr. Hallett was declared the winner and awarded the prize of a handsome gold medal. Both young men are capable ad-writers.

Mr. Hallett, the successful contestant, is a bright young ad-man of no mean ability, is 22 years of age, and hails from Stroudsburg, Pa. He is a graduate of the Page-Davis Advertising School of Chicago, and is a credit to that institution.

This is what Mr. M. L. Hallett says about his victory:

Really I cannot help feeling a little proud of my success over Sanborn. Consider it quite a "feather in my cap." Thanking you for your kind interest, I am as ever

GEORGE A. WRIGHT a prize winner twice in succession

MR. GEORGE WRIGHT

Led by a flattering offer to go to England, Mr. Wright accepted the advertisement-writing of the Ille Bean Co., Leeds, England. After a short stay, Robt. Wright & Co. induced him to return and resume charge of his old position, where he is now located.

The PAGE-DAVIS CO. is in receipt of the following notice, taken from the Brockville Recorder and forwarded to us by Mr. Geo. A. Wright.

FOR THE SECOND TIME
Geo. A. Wright Wins the Bissell Carpet Sweeper Advertisement Prize

For the last two years the Bissell Carpet Sweeper Company, of Grand Rapids, Michigan, have instituted an advertisement contest, offering handsome cash prizes, to be competed for by handlers of their goods in all parts of the country. The prize for 1900 was won by Mr. George A. Wright, advertising manager for Robt. Wright & Co., of this town. To-day Mr. Wright was notified that he had also been successful in winning first prize in the 1901 competition, and a check for the amount of the prize, $75.00, was inclosed. Mr. Wright thus wins the big prize for two years in succession, which is certainly quite an honor and a high tribute to his genius and ability in that line. The advertisement with which the prize was won was one that appeared in the Recorder last December, and the Recorder's ad-artist, it is needless to say, also feels very happy over the result in that his work has achieved such signal distinction.

There were over 3000 competitors for the prize, including all the leading newspapers in Canada and the United States. Mr. Fred Macey, of the Fred Macey Co., Grand Rapids, was judge, and after a very careful examination awarded the prizes. The Recorder congratulates Mr. Wright on his success and trusts he may go on achieving still greater fame as an ad-writer.

Advertising Manager R. W. & Co.

WHAT HAPP

The following letters are ranged consecutively as recei from Mr. Jones and mark progress in the study and ultimate success. This yo man rose from a silk salesman advertising manager.

The following is the story of a succ ful man who received his entire adve ing education through the Page-D Correspondence School. He is making a good salary. We might ture to say, more than he ever could h hoped to command in his previous p tion.

How It Happened

J. E. Jones, a silk salesman for W. Foley in the small city of Houst Texas, noticed our "ad" in one of Sunday papers that read as follows:

We are prepared to privately teach by mail practical advertisement writing; good salaries; big demand; send for prospectus. The Page-Davis Co., Chicago.

He answered it on the morning of June and in five days from the date of recei our prospectus he forwarded his applicati He then began his life's work in earnest. appreciated the opportunity we offered to th who have the desire to rise from their best path of routine and took hold of the new wo with a desire and will to progress. Houston, Texas, June 5.

PAGE-DAVIS CO.,

GENTLEMEN: In answer to your "ad" in Sun day's paper, kindly send me your prospectus an all further information concerning your cour of instruction. In advance I must say I am a sil salesman, and I believe I can do something mo than waste my life behind a counter. I believe see an opportunity to make something of myself

Yours truly,
J. E. JONES.

We answered the above letter and presented the facts fairly and honestly before him and his reply was:

Houston, Texas, June 18.

PAGE-DAVIS CO.,

GENTLEMEN: Enclosed find draft for six months' tuition. I believe I can make a success I am looking for a change. I am not much in the "ad" line, but I am a good dress goods and silk salesman. Would rather not sell if I can help it.

Yours truly,
J. E. JONES.

Mr. Jones displayed energy and ambition from the very start and he diligently followed out our instructions in every instance. After he had progressed one month he moved to Marlin, Texas, where he soon secured a position as a salesman in a dry goods house. On July 28, 1899, Mr. Jones writes as follows:

Marlin, Texas, July 28.

GENTLEMEN: I must say your system of teaching the advertising business is far beyond my expectations. I am surely gaining points that I would not expect outside of practical experience.

Yours for success,
J. E. JONES.

NED TO JONES

We now progress to four months later and after arduous work Mr. Jones began corresponding with Garbade, Eiband & Co., the large and well-known dry goods house, Galveston, Texas. The following explains itself:

Marlin, Texas, Nov. 5.

GENTLEMEN: After the 12th send no mail to me here. I have secured a position in Galveston, Texas, where I will conduct the "advertising "for Garbade, Eiband & Co., the leading dry goods house of that city.

I would like to make a good start. If you could assist me with something flashing or catching for an "ad" introduction it would prove a great help to me. Yours truly,

J. E. JONES.

Galveston, Texas, December 10.

GENTLEMEN: I am beginning to realize I am making marked progress under your instruction —compared to what I did two months ago. The thing I need now is to be assisted in my work.

I send herewith my last "ad." It still has lines in it. Do you mean that there should be no lines whatever in an "ad"? I see most all the large "ads." have lines all through them. Next week I will send you a full page "ad"—don't know what amount of matter for composition as I never got up over 3 full page "ads" in my experience.

Thanking you for your courteous words and kind expression, I remain,

Yours truly,

J. E. JONES.

Galveston, Texas, December 23.

PAGE-DAVIS CO.,

GENTLEMEN: The "ad" inclosed is following out your instructions. I have omitted all the column rules and employed all my knowledge gained. The result is that last Monday our sales were ....., which is an exceptional day's business for this burg. Yours truly,

J. E. JONES.

Galveston, Texas, January 2.

PAGE-DAVIS CO.,

GENTLEMEN: About preparing the page "ad" —I just haven't time. I will mail you proof of 5-col. "ad" that will appear in Sunday's "News," with the hopes that it will answer for this lesson. If it doesn't I'll sit up all night, if necessary, to prepare one.

Respectfully, J. E. JONES.

Galveston, Texas, January 15.

GENTLEMEN: In replying to your criticism on the "ad" of 2nd inst., will say the Galveston papers haven't followed out my instructions as they should. I repeatedly give instructions regarding contrast in light and dark type.

Regarding illustrations, I have carte-blanche and will use cuts in all my future "ads." To give you an idea of my work: we have contracted for 175,000 lines per annum in the morning papers; also advertise in the afternoon papers; that amounts to about $50,000 per year. You will see that our extensive advertising keeps me pretty busy at present.

Yours respectfully, J. E. JONES.

And now to conclude, Mr. Jones writes:

Galveston, Texas, January 20.

PAGE-DAVIS CO.,

GENTLEMEN: In closing my connection with your institution I wish to express my high appreciation of the service you have rendered me. I am now holding a nice position as advertising manager for one of the largest department stores in the southwest, due solely to knowledge acquired through your system of instruction.

I heartily commend your system as thoroughly practical to others who may wish to take up this interesting and fascinating work.

Respectfully, J. E. JONES.

What Louis G. Booth has done you too can do

From Clerk to Advertising Manager of One of the Largest Wholesale Jewelry Houses.

What we have done for him we want to do for you. Will you give us the opportunity to prove our claim? Our students are successes—we are a success and to be successful deal with successful people.

A year or so ago Mr. Booth was a jewelry salesman on a small salary: today he is the advertising manager for one of the largest wholesale jewelry concerns in the country—Benj. Allen & Co. A few words from his own pen tell the story.

Messrs. Page-Davis Co.

GENTLEMEN: Pardon me for not answering you before, but as you realize the busy season keeps me humming I simply neglected it. You ask me what do I think of you. It is impossible for me to write it. It would take too much paper. Just let me say that when I began the study of advertising I knew nothing at all about it and held a menial position. Today I am advertising manager for Benjamin Allen & Co., one of the largest wholesale jewelers in the country. Under these circumstances what more could I say? Yours respectfully,

The Reading Table

The Spoonerism

OUR candidates for the Rhodes Scholarships, it is understood, will have to undergo some kind of examination as a test of their qualifications. If in the course of this ordeal they were confronted with the proposition, "Define a Spoonerism and give illustrations," few of them, however well coached in textbooks of rhetoric, would be able to supply an answer. Yet it is safe to say that every successful candidate, before his first term at Oxford is over, will be a competent authority on this remarkable figure of speech.

It derives its name from a distinguished Oxford "don" who, after a tutorship of many years, has just been appointed to the headship of New College. He suffers from a tendency to misplace the initial consonants of some of the words he uses. For instance, it is reported that he once had to rebuke an undergraduate for idleness. The point he wished to emphasize was that two whole terms had passed without fruitful results. "I am sorry," said Mr. Spooner, "to have to speak so severely to you, but I am informed that you have broken many rules of the college, you have been incorrigibly lazy, and to cap it all you have deliberately tasted two worms!"

No doubt some of the stories attributed to Mr. Spooner are invented, and some should be attributed to other persons. It may be convenient, however, to group together here a few that are reported to spring from this source, with the proviso that no sworn affidavits are offered in confirmation. Some are concerned with the pulpit, which, of course, gives many opportunities for confusion of expression. The Mr. Spooner of fable is said to have aroused sympathetic feelings among the boating men in his academical congregation by declaring that "Peter coxed, and the crew went out and wept bitterly." Preaching in the college chapel at the time of the diamond jubilee of her late Majesty he remarked impressively, "Now, my brethren, you have a very queer dean, a very queer dean indeed." As his own relations with the dean of the college were not just then the most amicable, this observation was especially enjoyed. In his farewell sermon at the parish church where he was once vicar, he called his congregation to witness that he had always been a shoving leopard to them. On another occasion he is said to have asked, with much dignity, "Who is there among us that has never felt a half-warmed fish within his breast?" And he is declared to have announced a hymn as beginning "From Iceland's greasy mountains."

One of the stories attributed to Mr. Spooner bears on the face of it evidence that it belongs properly to some one else, for he is an accomplished musician. The rightful hero of the tale, whoever he may be, was asked if he were fond of music. "Yes," was the answer, "but I have a very poor ear. In fact, the only tunes I can really remember are 'God save the weasel' and 'Pop goes the Queen.'"

If rumor is to be believed, Mr. Spooner's tendency to verbal confusion once caused him considerable personal inconvenience. He was wandering about Greenwich, inquiring in vain for a hotel called "The Dull Man." No inn of that name was known anywhere in the neighborhood, and passers-by whom he consulted could not suggest any clue. At last a happy thought struck a policeman at the street corner. "I see what you mean, sir; what you want is not The Dull Man at Greenwich, but The Green Man at Dulwich."

Yet another story is of even more value to students of the Spoonerism for it suggests that the gift may be hereditary. A little son of the house at breakfast one morning, wishing his father to give him the marmalade, made request as follows: "Please pass the parlor-maid, mamma."

A Player's Memories

SEATED, the other day, in the office of one of his London theatres — he is managing two and building a third — Sir Charles Wyndham said: "During my first visit to Washington I met John Wilkes Booth, destined later to play so lamentable a part in his country's history. Our first approach to an acquaintance was made on the steps of Willard's Hotel. I gave an organ-grinder a penny. Booth, who was standing there, did the same, and turning said to me with a smile, 'What a bond between us is art.'

"He was a remarkable man, one whom you would instantly single out in a crowd. His eyes were black, penetrating and flashing, possibly the flash of insanity. He was a man who knew nothing at all of conventionality, and did not mind pain. One night he was

A SPRING DAY

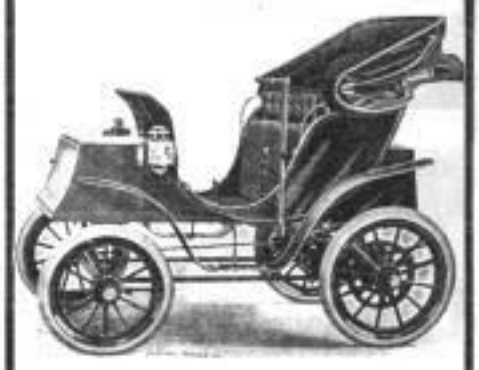
By Charles Battell Loomis

8 A. M. It doth appear that spring is here,
For verdant blades are seen:
The robins sing like anything,
The lilac bush is green.

10 A. M. A summer breeze and then a freeze.
Black clouds, a lusty gale;
The robin's toes are deep in snows,
He's buffeted with hail.

12 M. Anon a thaw, though winds be raw,
And now the Torrid Zone
Has spilled its heat on field and street,
And roasting people groan.

2 P. M. The blossoms come and young bees hum,
We don the shirtwaist gay;
Now cooling drinks at golfing links —
"It's like a summer's day."



4 P. M. Once more it blows and likewise snows,
The lilac buds are freezing.
5 P. M. While home we fare for winter wear,
6 P. M. Poor spring retires, sneezing.

Ivers & Pond PIANOS.

The Small Grand.

We show above photographic reproduction of our latest triumph, a Grand Piano in miniature. It is one of the smallest Grand Pianos made. It's not so very much more costly than the Upright, and doesn't take up much more room, fitting beautifully into the corner of a room (if you can't give the middle up to it), yet by an ingenious arrangement it has strings as long and a sounding-board as large as are usually put into larger Grands, thus producing a tone of remarkable volume and purity. No amount of money can buy a better Grand, for no better can be made.

Are you interested to know more? Our catalogue will be sent for the asking, and other circulars, together with a letter fully explaining all you wish to know.

HOW TO BUY.

Our unique method of selling may interest you. Where no dealer sells our Pianos we sell direct; practically bring our large Boston establishment, Factory and Warerooms to your door. We will quote you our lowest prices, explain our Easy Pay System, as available in the most remote village in the United States as if you lived in Boston or New York. More than this, if our careful selection of a Piano fails to please you, in other words, if you don't want it after seeing and trying it, it returns to us and we pay railroad freights both ways. We solicit correspondence.

playing in The Marble Heart, although that day he had had a bullet extracted from his neck, which was stiff and bound up in a handkerchief. He had an apology made for him before the curtain, but went on playing his rôle with a passion that carried no trace of physical pain.

"He was a charming and delightful companion, and would have been the greatest actor of his day. He was far superior to his brother, Edwin Booth, and of better instinct and spontaneity.

"Mr. Joseph Jefferson and myself were the first to take out our own companies. In those days traveling arrangements were far below the perfect standard to which they have now been brought in America, but though comfort was sacrificed the picturesque was enhanced.

"I recall an amusing and unique incident that occurred while my company was journeying from New Orleans to Memphis, where an engagement was to be played. On arriving, one morning at eight o'clock, at a little town called Granada, we were told that we should be delayed for twenty-four hours by a breakdown. We went off to the hotel for rooms and breakfast. In about two hours a deputation of citizens called to ask whether I would not give a performance there that night, as we were bound to stay. Three difficulties presented themselves: our baggage had gone ahead and there were no costumes; when I looked at the hall I found they had no scenery, and, quite an important point, in view of the limited population, I feared we should have no audience. The first two they were obligingly willing to dispense with, and I was assured that they had no doubts as to an audience. If I consented they promised to send mounted runners out into the country round about, and felt sure of a crowded house. Upon this I took my chances and agreed. At about four o'clock I looked in at the hall and asked the manager how they were doing. 'Go upstairs and see,' he said, settling himself back complacently. When I looked in I saw a great collection of chairs, kitchen-stools, armchairs, library-chairs, chairs of every make and description. Going back I said, 'I see nothing except that the place which was empty this morning is half full of chairs.'

"'That's exactly it,' he answered with genial assurance. 'Every one who books brings his or her chair, and for every chair that you see there will be an occupant to-night.' And there was. Beyond that, many more arrived equipped in the same practical manner. People arrived from all over the country bringing chairs in their carts, while whole families came trooping up later with servants marching behind, each carrying four or five chairs on his head. It was an extraordinary sight and a most pleasant experience, and so far as the performance and its reception were concerned the night was declared a record one for Granada.

"When I played in St. Petersburg the first intimation the manager had that the Czar and members of the royal family would be present that night was the arrival of the Imperial cook to make coffee and pastry to be served to them during the presentation. The Czar, Alexander III, a charming, reserved man, frequently attended the performances with his family. It was an unwritten law that an actor should never turn his back on the Imperial box, no matter what the demand of the scene on the stage might be, an unwritten law that I transgressed.

"Another inevitable custom was that in acknowledging a recall the actor must bow first to the Imperial box, whether it were full or empty.

"During our stay the Czar placed a carriage and pair at my disposal, and on the occasion of the blessing of the Neva had the further attention to detail an officer to be with us during the ceremony.

"One night at the opera, after the close of our engagement, the request was sent through the Minister of Interior that we play in English privately before the Czar the next evening, which we did in a little piece called The Happy Pair. Prior to that we had played in French. Four weeks after our return to London we received a communication from the Russian Ambassador, M. de Stahl, asking us to come to the Embassy as he had gifts for us from the Czar. We thought it a hoax, and would not go. Four days later I happened at a supper-party to sit next to Lady Kilmury, who told me that M. de Stahl had said he could not understand why we declined to come. The next day we went and received them, after having narrowly escaped hoaxing ourselves by staying away." —William Armstrong.

Angelus Piano Player

WHAT more exquisite enjoyment than the music you can produce from your own piano—if you have an Angelus? Ever since 1897 this most remarkable instrument has brought unbounded pleasure to thousands of persons to whom music in the home was a rarity. Now, with the aid of an Angelus, you can play on your own piano anything you like—the dear old songs, the popular music of the day, or the classical compositions. Any or all of these are within your scope, and you do not need to know one note of music from another, for the Angelus reads the notes and strikes the proper keys for you.

The expression devices are so very ingenious and complete that you can obtain effects equal to the best pianists—the delicate shading, the phrasing, the accenting of notes or chords, the sustaining or emphasizing of the theme or melody while subduing the accompaniment. The sweet-toned reeds in the style 65 are a most delightful feature. With these you can enhance to a marked degree the beauty of many compositions. We put the question straight to you—Why don't you buy an Angelus and make your piano worth something to you as a musical instrument? Price only $250.00.

Recollections of M. de Blowitz

"Yes, but in the mean time they have not hesitated to violate my rights. It was a great trouble to me, as I value their friendship very highly, and I fancy that mine is not to be despised by either of them. In so many different points we come into contact with each other, and the policy of a nation should take this seriously into account. Then, too, friendship between nations is not only manifested by diplomatic actions, it is shown also by the equitable way in which it judges a country. My country is judged superficially and that is the reason it is calumniated. I value the opinion of Europe and I wish that credence were not given there to those who amuse themselves with spreading satirical reports about us. I am told that you have seen a great many people here, and, as you must be in the habit of observing, will you tell me whether you have drawn any inferences from what you have seen?"

"If Your Majesty will allow me to speak frankly, and I can scarcely do otherwise, as if I did I might be obliged to write to-morrow the contrary of what I said to-day, my opinion is this: I believe that every evil from which this country is suffering could be remedied, and easily remedied. But there are two difficulties: the first is, that all depends on the unique will of Your Majesty, and consequently Your Majesty would have to give up to a certain degree this absolute will. The second difficulty is that, when Your Majesty decided to do this, those whom Your Majesty commands would have to agree to this partial and progressive abdication. Now, the curious part is that those who depend on the absolute will of Your Majesty will probably be the first to resist a change which would prevent them from screening their own faults under the cover of the absolute orders of their Sovereign. But, if once this were obtained, if Your Majesty could succeed in creating an administration with the capabilities and the energy necessary for carrying out the reforms decided upon, it would be an immense step toward the improvement of Turkey. Your Majesty holds in his hand all liberty, because he alone can will everything. If Your Majesty would open his hand, little by little, setting gradually free this liberty, in proportion as the country is capable of accepting and of using it, Turkey would rapidly rise from her present position."

"I understand perfectly well what you have just said," answered the Sultan. "I am glad to find that you do not share the opinion of those who believe that this country cannot recover. As to what you say with regard to myself I am of your opinion, and I have quite decided to gradually open my hand. The difficulty is to know just how far to go. When it was seen that this country could not support a constitution, and a parliament which was not the entire representation of the country, but only of a part of the country, people came to me and began to talk about responsibilities. It was another way of reorganizing a constitution. I refused this. Those who talked about responsibilities only saw in this a means of substituting their will for mine at the expense of others, and the great mass of the country would only have changed from the will of one to that of another. I am now trying, as you have just said, to prepare this country for the more independent part it has to play, and I have already modified many things which are not seen outside the country, but which are producing an effect within."

Then returning obstinately to his first idea he asked:

"Do you think that the English will soon consent to evacuate Egypt?"

"I have already had the honor of replying to Your Majesty on this subject," I said. "But I will take the liberty of remarking that England is in Egypt against her will. When she asked Your Majesty to go with her to Egypt, influenced as she was by that secret dread which takes possession of all who are laying their hand on no matter what Ottoman territory, she was absolutely sincere. It was a great and terrible mistake of Turkey to refuse to accompany her, thus obliging England to go alone, which meant to remain there. History will confirm with equal astonishment both this proposal of England and Turkey's refusal. The only consolation of Turkey, if there can be any consolation, is that in this question France was no wiser than she was."

I knew perfectly well that I had just attacked the Sultan directly. I therefore awaited his reply with some impatience. I thought, or rather I feared, that he would bring forward some of those subtle arguments, which the organs of the Ottoman press have endeavored to circulate, in order to attenuate the effect of the refusal of the Porte. But Abdul-Hamid, I repeat and I proclaim it, is a man of superior mind, who when he is struck by sound reasoning is perhaps annoyed, but at the same time influenced by it. As he had no good arguments to offer, and he would not stoop to poor ones, he did not reply, but changed the subject. This was, as any one can see, a tacit approval of what I had just said, and I learned later that it was to be interpreted in this way.

"When are you leaving?" he asked.

"To-morrow, Your Majesty."

"So soon! I am sorry you are not staying longer. But I should like you to bear in mind that, if you write to me, either about things that have happened or about current topics, I will answer you. If, for state reasons, I am unable to, I will tell you plainly that I cannot do so. Take note, too, that if ever you come again to Constantinople you must come the very day of your arrival to see me. You have only to say that it was my wish that you should come, that it was by my order you asked to see me, and I promise you that I will receive you. And as I am now talking to some one who understands the gravity of the mission confided to the veritable journalist, who endeavors to find out the truth and to publish it, remember that I do not wish to suppress existing liberties but to give new liberties; that I do not wish to increase the financial troubles of my empire but to remedy them, and that I do not wish to confiscate justice but to establish and consolidate it. Remember that this nation which bears in itself those causes of its weakness also contains the elements of great strength, and that I wish to cure the former and make use of the latter."

Abdul-Hamid rose and at this moment there was an expression in his eyes which showed that he was deeply moved. I quite understood that he felt sincerely what he had just been saying to me, but that at the same time he saw rising up before him all the obstacles which stood between his plans and their realization. He had just been pleading, as it were, to a European journalist the cause of his race and of his people, and a struggle was perhaps going on within him between the duty of the monarch and the pride of the Kalif. It did not last long, though. Abdul-Hamid drew himself up, went a few steps with me and then, taking my hand in his, held it a few minutes while he spoke.

"His Majesty thanks you for your visit which he will remember with pleasure," interpreted Raghib Bey, "and he begs you to accept this in memory of this conversation."

He handed me a box containing the insignia of the second order of the Medjidie, just as I had bowed to Abdul-Hamid for the second time at the door of the room in which he had received me.

I found my friends where I had left them. They were rather surprised at my long absence. I explained to them what had happened and we decided to go to Osman Bey, the first chamberlain, and present my thanks according to the custom of the country.

Osman Bey, one of the most enlightened Turks, who has established and endowed the largest existing printing works in the Ottoman Empire, received me with the affability peculiar to Turks of the educated class, and, after offering us coffee, called one of his officials, who appeared to be accustomed to this duty, to fasten on the right side of my coat and to place round my neck, in spite of my tourist's costume, the insignia of my new dignity, so that as Osman Bey said, according to the prescriptions, "the will of the Sultan may be accomplished."

I then left the Yildiz Kiosque with my friends. The numerous Turks whom we met saluted me respectfully without appearing astonished at my accoutrements which made me feel somewhat embarrassed.

The guards of the Palace shouldered arms, and when I had passed through the last gateway and saw the crowd looking at me, understanding that I had just had an interview with the Sultan, I said to myself:

"I only hope that no caricaturist will catch sight of me!"

Crane smiled a little.

"Annette is a regular Spartan when it comes to practical matters. She would advise me to give up my rooms at the expensive hotel and go into the country near by for the remainder of the session."

"Could any advice be more judicious?" asked Constance. "And is it any disadvantage to a public man, who is known to be a poor man, to live plainly?"

"By Heaven!" exclaimed Crane. "You are right! It would show those fellows in the Legislature next January that I have clean hands. What an admirable suggestion! And I can save at least enough to pay half what I owe on that note before the end of the session!"

"You forget," said Constance gently, "that the suggestion really is your wife's. Perhaps if you had listened to her oftener you would have found life easier. You are perhaps like many another man—he marries a pretty little thing, and she remains to him a pretty little thing. Meanwhile, she may have developed a capacity for affairs far superior to his."

Crane did not like the hint that perhaps Annette's head for affairs was better than his—but he had heard several home truths that afternoon.

He rose to go, and his changed aspect confirmed his words when he said earnestly to Constance:

"I came in here with shame and despair in my heart. I go away enlightened and encouraged and comforted beyond words. You will at least let me say that it is to you I owe it."

"Good-by," replied Constance cheerfully.

The feeling that another woman's husband or lover can be enlightened, encouraged and comforted by her is a very awkward circumstance to a woman of sense.

The Home-Coming of Bill

By Hayden Carruth

NOT all of the former denizens of Sentinel Butte had been notable for strenuous wrestlings with material things: it appeared there had been men of studious and artistic impulses as well. One of these had been devoted to the study of fiction, according to Mr. Milo Bush, whose memory supplied the following details:

There just never was a man so took up with reading as old Henry Barleyback. Greatest reader you ever seen, 'less it was his wife, who was 'most as bad. Their son Bill was some on the read, too, but not so much, alternating his hours of stoodiousness with periods of artistic effort with the fiddle, as the old man used to say. They took the New York Weekly Fambly Fudge, a journal devoted to Art, Science, Literatoor, Philosophy and Political Eeconomy, which always had chunks of eight long stories with the lovely heeroine a-hanging over a percerpice at the end in every case. Says I to the old man one day after looking over a copy: "Old man, them there lovely critters do hang over percerpices pretty unannermous, don't they? What's their object?" "The villain persoos 'em relentlessly," says the old man, heaving a sigh. "Bully for the villain," says I; "more length to his legs," not ever taking much stock in Art, Science, Literatoor, Philosophy and Political Eeconomy. "Ah, they will be rescood," says the old man; "the heero is a-coming licketty-split." Then he goes on sort o' speaking to himself: "Begun in our No. 76,485. To be continnered in our next. By the author of The Poisoned Gumdrop; or, The Candy Woman's Revenge."

Powerful reader of books, too, the old man was. Got 'em mostly with coupounds for cakes of soap and six cents in stamps to pay for postage and packing. "The books make it much lighter on the heeroines," he used to say; "they don't have to hang on the percerpice nothing like so long. You can just chase along to the next chapter and get 'em rescood. Though it's some aggervating when they say, 'We must now, reader, take leave of the lovely creeter, Lady Pentonville, only darter and heiress of the stern old Lord Newgate, Marquis of Tyburn, and return to the boodoor of the Comtesse of Clichy,' and she a-hanging over a percerpice by a single hair, and the country full of villains and redskins. But it can't be helped—these here authors will harrer you up this way."

The old man got so took up with reading that he didn't pay much attention to anything else. One day a stranger come along moving West with one mule and one ox hitched to a kivered wagon, and he stopped and borrowed $5 of old Barleyback; and the old man never got over looking for him to come back and restore that five, as he said, and mebby make it five hundred. "That's according to my reading," says he; "you help the young man when he is struggling and back he comes a'ter a while and mebby marries your darter." It was always a great trouble to the old man that he didn't have a darter to be romantic about. But he made the most of his boy Bill, while he lasted, for along towards one spring Bill up and run away from home and disappeared. At first this rather pleased the old man as being storified. "Bill has gone to seek his fortune," says he. "He will return to the old home and make us all rich." But it soon got pretty lonesome without the boy, and the old man worried a good deal and got some thin and downcast.

It went on all summer and fall, and still Bill didn't come back. Then as it came along two days before Christmas the old man got an igee. He was half tickled to death over it, and though he was coming down town he turned around and walked straight back home. It was dark by the time he got there, and he went right out into the kitchen and says he to his wife:

"Jane, don't you know how they always come back to the old homestead Christmas Eve?"

"Yes, that's so, Henry," says she. "Or just as the minister stands up to marry the girl to the other feller."

"Never mind about that," says he; "Christmas is our game. Bill will be back to-morrow night."

"Well, I hope so," says she.

"Hope so!" says old Barleyback, cross as a bear; "he is coming. He's read the books 'most as much as us—he knows what's proper. He may be far away, and it may be a hard pull for him to get here in time, but he'll make it, see if he don't. Only we've got to play our part."

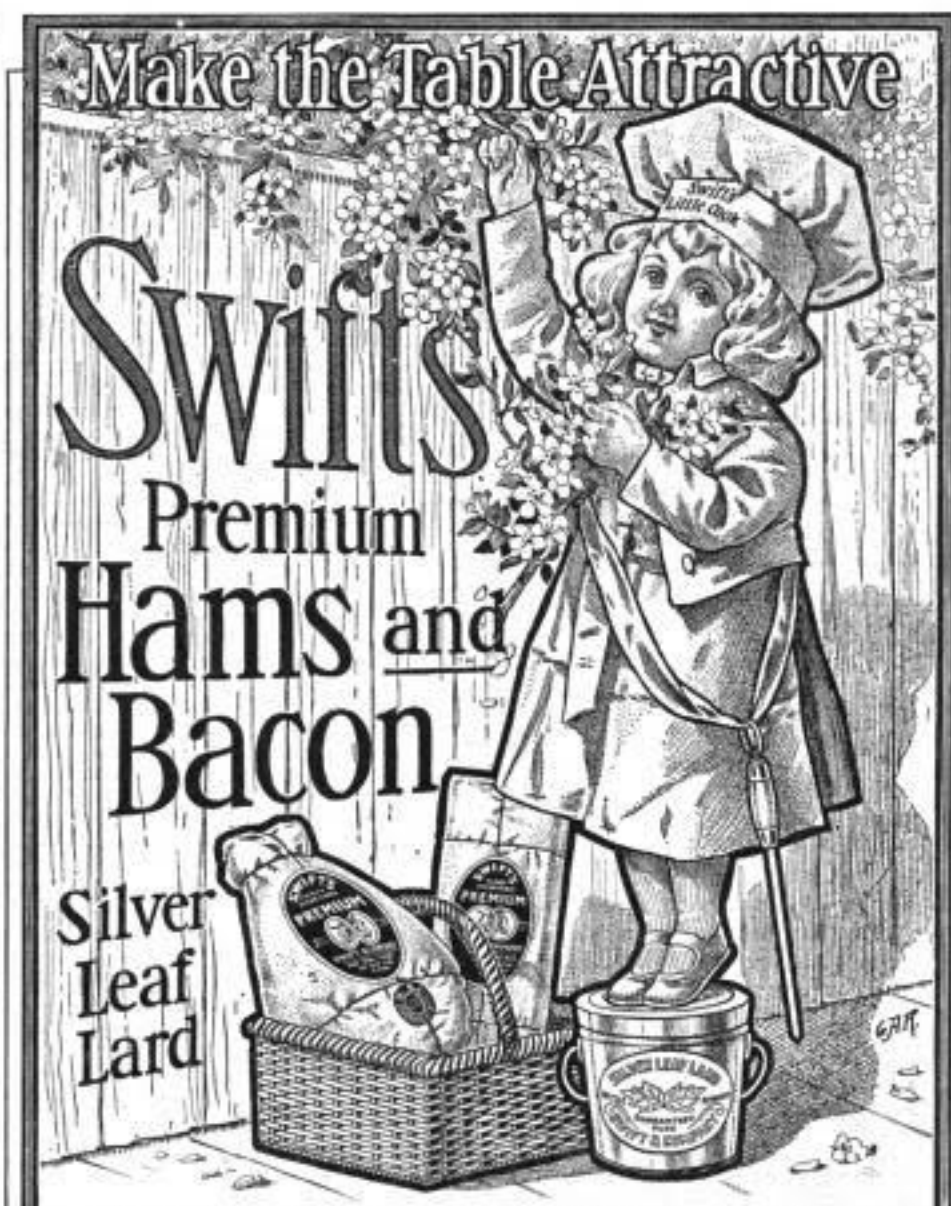
"We must be setting by the fire a-mourning him as dead," says the old lady.

"Correct," says Barleyback, "with the lamp in the winder, like this." And he takes the kerosene lamp and goes over and sets it on the winder-sill. "Its durned beams shine out and guide the wanderer, you know," he goes on. "He sees 'em and says he: 'Home at last, thank Heaving! Alars, I have wandered fur since here I passed my innercent youth! Ah, will they be glad to see me? Does any heart still beat for the Wanderer? Oh, there is the old gate, and the old willer tree, and the old barn sheltering the patient kine, and the old grindstun, and there, Heaving be praised! the old doorway out of which I passed. Home, mother, joy, alars! I will creep up, raise the latch and walk in!' That's the way it always is, and we must be ready for it."

"Well, there'll be time enough to get fixed 'fore to-morrow night," says his wife.

"Oh, yes; but I was kinder rehearsing," says the old man. "Mebby we can have Mis' Jones come in and play the organ soft-like in the front room—that always adds. Then we'll set right here 'fore the fire," he goes on, setting down near his wife by the stove. "We'll be setting here and a-talking 'bout him, as I said. Does seem a pesky long time since Bill went away," says the old man, sort o' solemn.

"Yes, it does," says the old lady, wiping a tear with the corner of her apron.



"And Bill was a fine boy," goes on the old man. "Our only son. It's been mighty hard to get along without him. I ain't said much about it, but my heart has been full. We think we have troubles, but they will be all gone with our darling boy back in our arms once more. He must come. I know he will come."

Just then they heard the door open and they rose up and turned around. There stood Bill. The old man give him a look like a thunder-cloud.

"You jim-fizzled fool," shouts he, "you're twenty-four hours ahead of time! Get out!" and he grabs up the fire-shovel and makes for him, and Bill retreats. And I'll be hanged if the boy didn't have to go down to the hotel and stay till next evening 'fore they'd let him come near the house.

Practical Business Precautions

By Otto Young

NO AMOUNT of petty precautions and complicated checks can make up for a failure to exercise good judgment in selecting sound timber for executive and responsible places in any business establishment. Here is where the head of any big enterprise finds himself put to the test. If he is not able to form a ready and reasonably accurate judgment of human nature he is lacking in the most essential requirement for success.

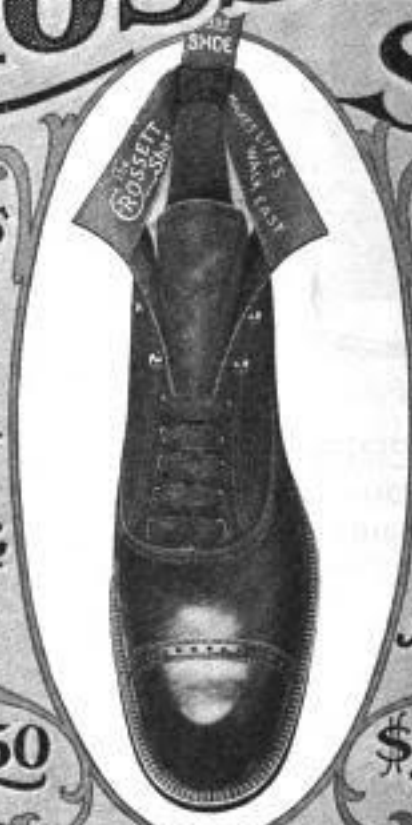
Let it be said, then, that the cardinal precaution which every business man should exercise is that of surrounding himself with honest, capable and active men. Inability to pick assistants of this kind makes all other precautions of doubtful value and discounts the most painstaking system of checking that may be devised. Carelessness in the choice of men for positions of any considerable responsibility is inexcusable. Lack of thoroughness in running down the records of all employees who are considered for responsible places is, however, of too common occurrence. This is a piece of inattention that accounts for many losses sustained by large business houses which suffer from employees who "go wrong."

The merchant or other man of business who is an extensive employer of clerical, accounting and executive labor should insist upon knowing the complete record of every man who handles his money or goods. This does not mean that he should accept a letter of commendation from the man's latest employer as proof of the applicant's desirability or integrity. Nothing short of a complete abstract of the applicant's record as an employee, beginning with his first position and continuing in an unbroken chain to his latest place, makes a really satisfactory and substantial basis for employment.

Of course, this is sometimes impossible to obtain, but it should always be approximated and serve as the standard of requirement. Why should a man be less particular about knowing the complete record of the employee who is to handle thousands of dollars of his money than he is to be certain that there are no weak spots in the title of a piece of property in which he desires to invest? To leave a possible cloud on the record of a lieutenant selected for an important place is a stroke of business as bad and careless as would be that of leaving a chance for a cloud on the title of a piece of real estate.

Watching an Employee's Way of Living

After a man's record has been sifted to the bottom by personal and searching investigation, and he is found to be above suspicion and is accepted as an employee, the next important precaution is that of studying his manner of living. If a man drops into the habit of being late in the morning, the conclusion that he keeps late hours at night is a fair inference, which is generally sustained by investigation. Promptness, on the other hand, is a fairly reliable indication of a steady and well-ordered life. Not many men who live fast and keep late hours at night are able to be invariably on time in the morning.



It may be put down as a safe rule, then, that late in the morning quite generally means late night hours—and the latter ordinarily also carries with it the proofs of fast living. To say the least, the employee trusted with responsibility, but who is not prompt, becomes a proper subject for investigation. If he is found to be living beyond his salary—spending more than he earns—there is only one more vital fact to be determined—that is: has he a private income which warrants his expenditures? If such is not the case, the wisest course is to dispense with that man's services after the accounts or affairs under his charge have been thoroughly overhauled.

It is not a general practice on the part of large mercantile houses to employ auditors or examiners outside the ranks of its employees, but this may be a prudent custom to follow. Whether the checking is done by an outside expert or by a person regularly in the employ of the establishment, there is no doubt that the overhauling of accounts should be carefully and systematically prosecuted at regular intervals.

THE NATIONAL PRESS ASSOCIATION
No. 67 The Baldwin Indianapolis, Ind.

Surveillance over the receiving end of a mercantile concern should be quite as strict as over the selling end. Collusion between drivers, receiving clerks and inspectors offers an opportunity for fraud on a larger scale than is to be found in almost any other department. Peculations here "run into money" with astonishing rapidity, but the operation is so difficult to accomplish without detection that it is, generally speaking, not often attempted. There are too many different checks upon each transaction to make ventures in this field of dishonesty particularly tempting or popular. However, it is possible, and therefore this loophole should be carefully guarded by the merchant who would not leave his business at loose ends.

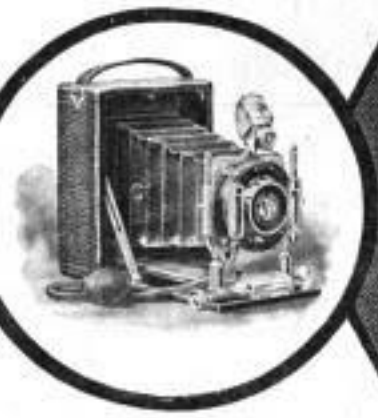
In a well-organized mercantile house there is little chance for drivers or delivery-men to make away with goods. They are stolen from more often than they steal—for they are held responsible for the goods placed in their care and must make good all losses. Perhaps this requirement sometimes works a hardship on some who, in spite of fair diligence, have packages filched from their wagons while making their rounds. Not to have this rule, however, would be to encourage carelessness and dishonesty and to court constant leakage in the department.

Precautions Made Possible by System

Even in an establishment having several hundred employees it is difficult to exercise all the precautions I have stated, but I know from personal experience that they may be carried out with a fair degree of precision and success in a concern having nearly four thousand persons in its employ. System will accomplish seeming impossibilities, and the mercantile business, large or small, that is not carefully systematized, cannot hope for success in these days of keen competition and small profit margins.

A fruitful source of leakage in a large mercantile business is that of careless measuring and inspection. This may seem, to the layman, to be getting things down to a decidedly "fine point"; but when it is remembered that thousands of yards of valuable fabrics are measured each day on the counters of a big city store the possibilities of careless measuring may be realized. The loss of an eighth of a yard on each dress pattern would amount to hundreds of dollars in the course of a month's sales in a big metropolitan store. The same observation applies with equal force to careless inspection. The inspector who allows better goods, or more of them, than are paid for, to slip through his fingers is a dangerous and costly source of leakage in any house. Small items make large totals with astonishing rapidity in an establishment having annual retail sales mounting high into the millions of dollars.

Any extensive retail store in a metropolitan city sustains a constant assault from the thieving fraternity. There is no way of arriving at the volume of loss from this unrelenting raid, but it may be said that the total would seem very large to the average country merchant and to the layman. To the sum actually lost in goods stolen must be added the cost of maintaining a system of house detectives. This runs into a very considerable amount in the course of a year.



Goods in a great department store must be freely displayed and exposed. This places them within reach of all comers. Where the shoppers number from 50,000 to 75,000 a day the task of keeping them under anything like careful surveillance is almost an impossibility. One precaution is to have experienced detectives posted near the entrances to "spot" the well-known and professional thieves and shoplifters. Men charged with this duty become remarkably expert and literally carry in their minds an extensive "rogues' gallery." When an incomer is identified in this manner he—or more often she—is requested to leave the establishment. This request is generally complied with, and that without words or argument. Only a hint is needed to the thorough-paced professional.

Schemes Devised by Shoplifters

Some unique and astonishing schemes are devised for the purpose of robbing the big city stores. Perhaps the most bold and dashing feat of this kind which has recently come to my attention was successfully carried out by a little girl not more than fourteen years old. She had been well coached and costumed for the trick. Whether she planned her campaign herself or was managed by some criminal more mature is a matter of conjecture.

In a rush of bargain-day trade a clerk made

THE FRANKLIN PRINTING & ENGRAVING COMPANY
507-511 Superior St., Toledo, Ohio

a sale, received from the customer a ten-dollar bill, and rapped on the counter for a cash girl. Another customer was waiting for the clerk, and when a voice answered "Number forty," and a girl in the regulation "cash" uniform of the store came up, the check slip, the goods and the ten-dollar note were handed, without second thought, into the upstretched hands of "Number forty." The latter disappeared in the direction of the cash and wrapping desk—and was never seen again! She contrived to secrete the goods under a counter without being seen and to make her way out of the store—perhaps under cover of a wrap hidden at a convenient place for the purpose of aiding her escape. Of course this scheme could not be repeated, as all the clerks thereafter were alert for another attempt of the kind and carefully scrutinized all unfamiliar cash girls.

The greatest care must be taken in the matter of accusing any person of theft, as a single mistake of this sort would lead to a costly suit for damages. One court judgment on this ground might easily mount high into the thousands of dollars and go beyond the value of all the goods stolen in the course of an entire year. No clerk in the establishment with which I am connected would presume to accuse a customer or bystander of stealing even if the latter were plainly seen to pick up an object and make away with it. Instead, a house detective would be summoned and the suspect shadowed until there was absolute corroboration of the theft by a second person, one experienced in the detection of shoplifting and capable of exercising mature judgment.

The cleverest ruse ever employed by a store detective to induce the return of stolen goods was that habitually followed by an old man who held a position on our detective staff. He would push close behind the person with the stolen goods and begin muttering: "Better put it back! Better put it back!" If the suspect looked around, the detective's eyes were rolling in another direction. But his words almost invariably did their work and the goods would be slyly left somewhere before the shadowed criminal reached the door. His warning seldom failed to produce the desired effect. This saved disagreeable scenes and complications, and also the risk of making an accusation not capable of absolutely legal proof.

The Problem of Wealthy Kleptomaniacs

Many kleptomaniacs are caught, and among them women of wealth and social position. While these seem to have a considerable amount of public sympathy, it is difficult to see how they deserve it so much as do the poor and desperate unfortunates who steal to satisfy the pangs of hunger or some other pressing form of necessity. If any offenders of the shoplifting fraternity are entitled to extreme leniency, they are those who are driven to it by desperate want, not by a freakish monomania.

It is possible to steal something besides the goods of a store. There is a class of persons who make what may be termed fictitious purchases. These are monomaniacs on the subject of buying. They make purchases of goods on a "transfer" or order them delivered "c. o. d.," never for a moment intending to receive or to pay for the articles ordered. If bought on a "transfer ticket"—which is devised for allowing various purchases in different departments, and by which the packages may be bunched and paid for at the "transfer" desk—the purchases are left unclaimed and without settlement. In case the goods are to be paid for "c. o. d.," they are refused when delivered. These transactions are made purely for the excitement of buying, and the practice robs the store of the time of the employees and forms one of the most irritating nuisances possible in the routine of traffic.

Close watch should be kept on the work of his buyers by every merchant doing a large business. He should be sure that they are not unduly influenced by the men from whom he buys; that they are, in other words, wholly above favoritism.

If their purchases are generally sound and in line with good judgment, and if they do not accumulate undesirable goods, it is fair to presume that they are honest and competent men. On the other hand, if they are prone to pick up bad bargains, it matters little whether their error is one of judgment or favoritism—they are not to be retained in either event and should be dispensed with. An unsound buyer is one of the most expensive luxuries which a merchant can possibly maintain.

HOW TO SECURE THIS

$25 Set of Books=Free

To just one hundred young men I am going to present "The Art and Literature of Business," which comprises six well-bound octavo volumes of approximately 400 pages each. It deals with the history, science and art of advertising, and tells exhaustively of every branch of the business.

The mechanical details, such as printing, engraving, etc., are taken up in their regular order, and the book is thus admirably adapted to the needs of the student of advertising and the business man who appreciates the necessity for a deeper insight into recognized methods of publicity, but who has heretofore been unable to secure a suitable reference work.

In a recent review Public Improvements, New York City, says:

"Each page contains some well-turned phrase that gives the whole a distinct literary flavor not generally met with in books of the kind. It is crowded with aphoristic philosophy that arouses and carries an interest from page to page. To all busy men this book will give great pleasure, for it treats of advertising in such a way as to make it as good a literary feast as a classic of the day."

J. F. LILLY, of Wright, Lilly & Co., Financial Agents, Colorado Springs, writes:

"The first volume of the Edition de Luxe of 'The Art and Literature of Business' has been read with much interest and profit. I consider this volume well worth the price it cost. Any young man contemplating a business career should make a careful study of advertising—the new force—and I have failed to hear of any set of books containing as comprehensive and authorized statements of the principles of advertising as this series. If there is anything better, the author will find me an easy victim."

CARL ABNER REAM, Advertising Agent, Canton, Ohio, says:

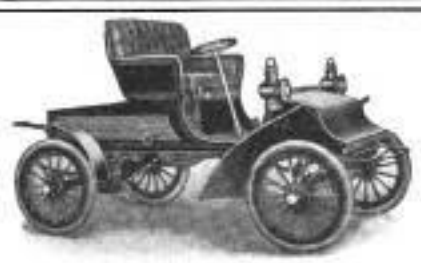
"I consider 'The Art and Literature of Business' a masterpiece, and don't think any person engaged in business of any nature whatever can afford to be without it."

The price of the six volumes, complete, is $25 cash, or on installments

I Will Give Away One Hundred Sets

To those who take my Course of Instruction in Advertising Writing and Management

There is no other thing so needful to the young man in business as a knowledge of advertising. It is the great force of modern business and no merchant or manufacturer succeeds without it. The advertisement writer and manager is one of the highest-priced employees in any business, and his opportunities for advancement are the best.



Any man with a good common school education, energy and common sense can win a place for himself in the advertising world. Many of those who have followed my instructions now hold positions with leading concerns, and are receiving from $30 to $125 a week. Good ad-writers usually earn from $20 to $100. The accompanying picture will give you an idea of what one man has done in less than ten years, beginning with a desk and a fountain pen. My course of instruction costs $40 cash, or $50 in installments. It is the best investment any father can make for his son or that any young man can make for himself. A remittance at once will secure the full course and a $25 set of "The Art and Literature of Business" free.

A handsome prospectus of the course, giving full particulars and evidence from students as to its benefits, will be sent on receipt of three two-cent stamps, to pay cost of mailing, and there will be included my booklets, "How Shall a Young Man Succeed," "Other People's Brains," and "The Ill-Fortune of Brother Bill."

Literary Folk
Their Ways and Their Work

The Red Terror

DURING the last two years an unprecedented number of translations of French memoirs and autobiographies have been issued by both English and American publishers. They have proved to be so popular and form now so large a portion of the literary food supplied to the public that they ought to have a special notice.

Some of these books have been given by their publishers to translators who had a critical, even a scholarly, knowledge not only of the French and English languages, but of the subjects treated.

But others have been left to the handling of ignorant hacks who not only have lost the flavor of the text in transplanting it into another tongue, but have abridged it mercilessly. It is not only a dead body which they give us but one cut and hacked beyond recognition.

With all these drawbacks, however, the recent large output of these translations affords an opportunity to the American boy and girl who know only their own language to begin their study of French history through French biography, which is, after all, the only way to begin it. An amusing proof of the avidity with which these books have been read was the sudden fury with which book reviewers here and in England lately pounced upon Mrs. Humphry Ward when she lifted the plot of Lady Rose's Daughter bodily out of the life of Mlle. d'Espinasse and made a novel of it. Two years ago, before the publication of the translation of the love letters of the French Sappho, the "borrowing" would most probably have passed undetected. The fictitious English heroine is, by the way, but a feeble reflection of the real Julie, whose words still scorch and whose tears sear the heart of her reader, long as she has lain in the grave.

Among the American translations, those of Miss Katherine Prescott Wormeley (Hardy, Pratt & Co.) are conspicuous. She has chosen the most important books to work upon and has been usually accurate and intelligent in her work. She showed this intelligence by making the famous memoirs of Mme. de Motteville the initial book of her series. The condition of France under Anne of Austria and her lover and master, Mazarin, are nowhere else pictured so sharply. The Queen's waiting-woman and confidante each night locked her door and sat down to record the doings of the court and people during the day with what Sainte-Beuve calls "a most reasonable mind and decent pen." A shrewd little woman, but neither romantic nor malicious, her pictures are correct as photographs. Day after day she showed the slowly changing relation of sovereign and people, the growth in the masses of the spirit of revolt which showed itself in the rational demands of the Fronde, and was to end thereafter in the guillotine and the Red Terror.

Aside from its historical value, no novel holds us with so rapt an interest as this story of Anne, a woman whose blood was that of a race which had ruled for centuries, to whom her subjects always were inferior creatures, akin to dogs or rats. With smiling contempt she faced mobs of them crying out for her blood; yet in soul and body she was the slave of a greedy, vulgar plebeian, whom she loved. The Cardinal, while he lived, did not spare the lash on his poor chattel. But when he was gone she stood upright, and presently died like a queen and a holy martyr.

It is a unique story. Having read it, our young student should take up the Memoirs of the Duc de Saint Simon. There are twenty volumes of this book in the original, which Miss Wormeley has cut down to four. She usually shows fine discretion in her abridgments. But slaughter so wholesale as this necessarily degenerates from murder into butchery. To use a homely simile, there is the same difference between the original work and its translation as between a royal sirloin and a pot of hash. But even this mutilated summary makes, for the careful reader, a consecutive page to Mme. de Motteville's memoir in the history of France. The great Duke, like the obscure waiting-woman, secretly wrote for many years at night in the solitude of his chamber the story of the court and of the black tides of human life around it.

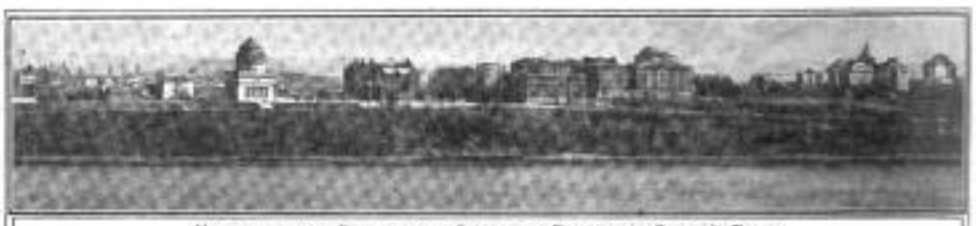
In the world there is no such gallery of portraits as we find in this book. Saint Simon gave his life to the making of it. From his boyhood to old age he secretly, daily sketched the people around him. Unconsciously, too, he sketched the progress of the canker in the body politic; on one hand the quick and enormous growth in power of the great financiers, and on the other the drainage of the life of the lower classes to support that power. The great Louis, supported by the Sorbonne, declared that the property of all subjects belonged primarily to the King, and proceeded to take it by the poll tax, the salt tax and at last the tithe tax. Saint Simon and many decent wise men of his order fought against this slow, monstrous strangling of a nation. But the King and great financiers calmly persisted. With each decade money in France accumulated into fewer hands and the starving mob held a class and not a system guilty.

It is a story not without significance to Americans.

The student would do well to next read Horace Walpole's and Madame de Sévigné's Letters, if he would make the court of the grand Louis as familiar to himself as are his own street and his neighbors. Whether his sympathy will be with the brutish fellow in the fields who boils grass to keep himself from starving or with his mistress in the château who may lose her virtue, but never her good breeding, is perhaps a matter of temperament. There certainly was a strong and just case on both sides.

Several translations have recently appeared bearing on the two following reigns. M. de Saint Armand's Life of Madame de Pompadour (Scribners) is, like his other books, perfunctory and lifeless, and bears the marks of a literary job undertaken for a given price. But as far as it goes it is correct.

The Memoirs of Madame Du Barry, translated by H. T. Riley, and of which a limited number were printed for the Caslon Society, were compiled with much skill, and probably give as faithful a picture of the famous courtesan and of Louis XV and his court during his old age as can be found. Nothing can be more foreign to modern eyes than the glimpse of Versailles with its magnificence and its filth, the couches of solid gold and the open sewers in the halls, the priceless pictures and statues crowding the chambers, with not a single bathtub in sight; lace fichus and strings of diamonds worth a principality covering necks still red with smallpox, and strangest of all, the homage, the servile worship given to a family coarse in body and brutish in habit beyond other men, even in that brutish age.



A little Memoir of the Princess Hélène de Ligne, edited by Lucien Perey (Richard Bentley & Son, London), throws a significant side-light upon the position and character of the noble women of France at that time.

Hélène was the daughter of a Polish prince of enormous wealth and was sent when eight years old to the Abbaye aux-Bois, a convent where only French girls of the highest rank were educated. There they were taught to sing, to dance, to speak one or two languages and to bear themselves in every strait as noble women of France. They learned that lesson well. These were the women who held the famous salons of Paris during that century, where wit and good breeding reached their finest flowering, and they were the women who looked down silently from the carts on their way to the guillotine with a calm surprise at their shrieking murderers.

At thirteen the parents usually notified the child that a husband had been chosen for her and brought him the next day to the convent. Great was the anxiety of the bride and her playmates to see him. If he were young and smiling, what universal joy! But no girl ever doubted that the bride would be pleasant and courteous in this new relationship. That was a matter of course. Presently, no doubt, the lover would come. They whispered of that with smiles and finger on the lip.

The child bride was betrothed in great state, then went back to her playmates and in a year or two was married and carried away to the court and the great world. Presently—the lover came, and she loved him. Was she so much to blame? Our little Polish Princess Hélène was married and afterward found her lover, and made her way to him, as she tells us, over three coffins. The story is worth reading. There is something to be said even for those faithless wives of Paris.

When the beginner in French history has come thus far there are a dozen memoirs which he should read simultaneously. Every historian of that period oddly becomes a special pleader either for or against Jacques. The student can correct the exaggerations of one biographer by those of his opponents.

Among these books are the first six volumes of the series of thirteen by Imbert de Saint Armand upon the Famous Women of the French Court (Charles Scribner's Sons).

A Life of Marie Antoinette, by Maxime de la Rocheterie (Dodd, Mead & Co.).

The Secret History of the Court of France, by De Challice (Henry Colburn, London).

When the student has learned the details of the great tragedy of modern history from these private gossips he will be ready to listen more calmly to the foremost of all special pleaders, Carlyle.

The Guardian of Marie Antoinette, just published (Dodd, Mead & Co.), is the most important recent contribution to the history of the period. It is an abstract of the private letters written by the Comte de Mercy-Argenteau, Ambassador from Austria to the French court for the Empress Marie Thérèse. They date from the arrival of Marie Antoinette in France a bride until the birth of her second child, eleven years later. The shrewd Comte was, in fact, a friendly spy sent by the Empress to watch over her daughter and to advise her. His report was dispatched weekly to her, not through the mails, which were open to the King, his ministers and his mistresses, but by secret messengers. These letters have been kept in the Royal Archives of Austria and are translated into English now for the first time.

They show us the court and the nation of France as they appeared to the keen eyes of a foreigner. There is no special pleading here. His sketches are bald facts; the senile old king who would not give a sou to the starving people whom he loathed, but who spent millions on his vices; his daughters, grown old and malignant in their virtue; his sons, one "fit to keep the bar of a country inn," the other the heir to the throne, an overgrown child, half-witted and filthy in person; both court and people under the rule of the vulgar, kindly mistress of the king, the illegitimate daughter of a hostler. Into this little world came Marie Antoinette, a child of fifteen, innocent, affectionate, tactless and as eager for amusement as any other girl of her age.

We all know the miserable story.

But this book shows us that the most tragic figure in it was not the young girl dancing gayly down the road to the guillotine, but her mother who had set her feet upon that road.

Marie Thérèse was the last of a long race of kings. It was natural that she should give her life to placing her children on thrones.

Once, the story goes, she opened the map of Europe before her little girl and asked: "What country should you like to rule over?"

"France," promptly replied the child, "because it has had the greatest and the holiest king of the world."

The shrewd mother reported the saying to Louis, who thereafter was resolved that this child should become the dauphine.

The marriage was urged on hastily. The vigorous old queen anxiously trained the little girl in the art of ruling. She taught her how to dress, how to speak, how to hold the impertinent in check, how to control her own curiosity and impulses, and above all, to submit to God. She knelt beside her daily and prayed with her. The great ruler was as vehement in her religion as in her policy. When the girl was married and gone, her old mother besieged God for her incessantly, and wrote her interminable letters of advice.

One is glad to find that the young girl always gave back her love. When she first set foot in her new kingdom her only words were: "I never shall see her again," with bitter tears.

She never did see her again. The old Empress, warned by Mercy year after year of the gathering dangers around her child, wrote endless warnings to her, and prayed and wept and sent little presents from home to comfort and please her just as any poor mother would do.

She died, fortunately, before the end came.

Another genuine book is the Memoirs of Mlle. des Echerolles (John Lane, London and New York). It is the true story of a child, one of the haute nobleste, during the Reign of Terror, written in after life by herself. It is inartistic, inconsequent and real. One hears the thud of the ax in it and smells the dripping blood.

With this book our student will probably have had enough of the phases of the Red Terror.

Oddities & Novelties of Every-Day Science

FOR DISCONTENTED COMMUTERS—A collapsible attachment to permit the ordinary bicycle to be run on railway tracks.

A BICYCLE contrivance has been invented which is said to be a novel improvement on similar attachments, inasmuch as it enables any bicycle of standard make to run on one of the rails of a railroad track. It consists of a braced frame intended to be connected to the frame of the bicycle, with guide-wheels that engage both rails of the track and hold the plane of the two bicycle wheels in true alignment.

A small wheel with an iron flange on the inner side, a wooden hub, and a rubber tire running in contact with the rail, is fitted with ball bearings and attached to the frame of the bicycle by two flat bars or irons clamped together by bolts. This wheel is thus kept directly in line with the bicycle wheels and just behind the front one. A brace rod connects the end of the front axle with a bolt and prevents the front wheel from turning to the right or left while in use. Connecting rods converge outwardly toward the other track rail and connect the bicycle to another small wheel having a flange on both sides.

Allowance is made for tipping the bicycle slightly toward the inside of a curve in the track or to enable the rider to incline his wheel against a gale blowing at right angles to his course.

All connections and bolts are fitted with thumb-nuts so that the entire attachment can be removed without tools.

The railway attachment outfit can be easily folded and carried, and an ordinary bicycle at a moment's notice may be made ready for traveling on a railway.

THE CONTRABAND BIRD TRAFFIC—The strange transformations undergone by familiar friends in the vernacular of the trade.

TAME birds are beginning to reappear in many localities where, a few years ago, it was believed they had been practically exterminated. In some places this is the result of the protection afforded the birds by Government and State authorities.

In the work of safeguarding threatened species many interesting incidents occur. It is unlawful at any time to sell or kill robins in the District of Columbia. It was known that in defiance of the law a fashionable café included robins on its menu. They were served as "Jerusalem pheasants." The waiters were wary, and when Government ornithologists tried to get evidence against the establishment by ordering these birds, the establishment was always just out.

Stratagem was employed. A man who had none of the telltale airs of the scientist was used as a decoy. He regaled himself on "Jerusalem pheasants" and smuggled the bones into his pockets. The next day he reported to the Biological Survey. The skeletons of his feast were reconstructed and examined and found to be the remains of robins.

Doctor Palmer confronted the café management with the evidence. The restaurateur sent for his lawyer, a prominent man who had once been on a hunting trip with President Roosevelt.

"These fellows," said the café owner, "cannot prove I sold robins inasmuch as the heads and feet of the birds were cut off and destroyed."

"On my Western trip," counsel replied, "there was a bird expert in the party. That ornithologist could identify any species if we passed him the wish-bone or any bone of the breast. As you can't very well serve your 'Jerusalem pheasants' minus the breast, I advise you to compromise and do it quickly."

The restaurant man weakened. His two thousand robins in cold storage were confiscated and a liberal fine imposed. Robins are safe now in Washington. This season they have appeared in numbers.

Every spring, particularly just before the Easter display of millinery, Doctor Palmer organizes an inspection of all establishments in Washington dealing in ladies' hats. In simultaneous cooperation with him throughout the various States are local wardens.

STARK TREES SUCCEED WHERE OTHERS FAIL

All hats trimmed with feathers of gulls and terns and other protected birds are seized. In some places the penalty imposed upon this contraband traffic is severe, but action is suspended where dealers agree to return the proscribed feathers to the wholesalers. The result is that most dealers are becoming wary of purchasing a stock of hat trimmings liable at any time to get them into trouble.

The trade, therefore, in artificial birds manufactured from feathers of barnyard fowl, ingeniously fixed to wire and wadding, with eyes of colored porcelain and beaks of bone, is growing prodigiously. In fact, in recent enactments prohibiting the importation of birds into the United States special exception is made of birds and bird plumage manufactured from the feathers of hens, roosters, ducks, geese, peafowls, Guinea fowls and turkeys.

Doctor Palmer was asked why such persistent effort had been made to protect gulls. He cited three reasons for their preservation. The first is that their piscatorial habits are an unfailing guide to the location and movements of schools of fish, the gulls thus rendering a great economic service to the fishing industry. In the second place, the work of the birds as scavengers in populous harbors is incalculable. Their destruction would be a menace to health. The third point in their defense is that they are picturesque, adding much attractiveness to many of the great American ports.

SCIENTIFIC RICE CULTURE—The Gulf planters are introducing Japanese methods, but do not fear Japanese competition.

SCIENTIFIC agriculture promises a new system of rice culture in America which will greatly lessen the cost of harvesting and will double the productivity of the plantations. It is an interesting fact that, in order to obtain this important secret in rice growing, America has been obliged to turn once more to Japan.

A few years ago it was found that the rice then grown in America was not sufficiently strong to stand machine methods. A new variety, called Kiushu, was introduced into Texas and Louisiana from Japan with results that have been very satisfying to planters. This variety is not subject to breakage in milling.

A new problem soon developed. Rice could be planted in the Gulf belt in March, April, May and June, but the time of harvest for these crops was about the same, regardless of the date of planting. Centuries of cultivation along regular lines had fixed the time of ripening. If the seed was planted late it grew to maturity with that much greater rapidity. As harvest rates for labor are high it has multiplied expenses to have to gather the crop in a short space of time. Experts, therefore, were sent to Japan recently to select seed of early, medium and late maturing varieties so that American planters can prolong the harvesting over several months. Fifteen varieties have been brought to the United States. Under scientific auspices this seed has been planted, and when fully tested will be distributed throughout the rice belt. It is believed that the experiments will disclose that the Japanese rice will retain the habits of growth fixed by ages of cultivation. If so, rice growers will be enabled to regulate the maturing of crops so that harvest-time can be extended over three or four months, and will require little, if any, more hired help than planting. It is estimated, moreover, that with this promised innovation the increase of rice production for each farmer will be from fifty to one hundred per cent.

Although the visiting scientists found much in Japan of profit to American rice husbandry, what they saw convinced them of the groundlessness of the economic fear prevalent in some quarters that Japanese agricultural products may ultimately compete with American in the home markets of the United States. Japan has a ratio of population of 3000 to every square mile of arable land. If Iowa fields were cultivated on the Japanese plan, that State would sustain a population of 150,000,000, while Texas would support over 600,000,000 people. In Japan there is a very narrow margin between consumption and the greatest possible production. The rice farmers of Japan have perfected their methods in fields many of which average about thirty-five feet square. The tax on these diminutive plantations is enormous, being not less than at the rate of eight dollars an acre. If an American farmer owning one hundred acres had to pay eight hundred dollars in taxes he would have little zest for agriculture.

37 Slightly Damaged Sets
For Saturday Evening Post Readers

At the close of our recent Half-Price Club sale of the International Edition of Shakespeare, a few slightly damaged sets of this magnificent edition were left over in our stock room. These sets have a few defects in the way of bindings which are a little rubbed in places, or a few slightly soiled pages, but there are no pages or illustrations missing. The sets have never been used, but have received slight injuries from handling in our stock room. They are damaged just enough to cause us to lower the price nearly to the bottom, and close them out to the first purchasers. If you are looking for a set of the best Shakespeare at a bargain, send us the coupon cut from this advertisement, and send it today. If your order is not received very promptly, we will not be able to guarantee delivery of one of the sets. We will send you a set for examination, and if you do not consider it worth more than our special price, you may return it to us, and we will pay express charges both ways.

Sets in 13 Illustrated Volumes. Size of Volumes 8 x 5¼ inches

The International Edition

In accuracy, clearness, convenience of arrangement, and in all that goes to constitute an ideal Shakespeare, the International Edition holds first place. This edition reproduces the famous Cambridge text, which has been for forty years the standard text of Shakespeare. To this text have been added Prefaces giving the history of each play; Critical Comments on the plays and the characters, taken from the works of great Shakespearean scholars; Glossaries following each play and defining every difficult word; Explanatory and Critical Notes, which make clear every obscure passage. There are over 400 Illustrations, many of them being rare wood-cuts of Shakespeare's time. There are also numerous full-page chromatic plates in colors and photogravures on Japan vellum. Included with the set is a complete Life of Shakespeare, containing the facts actually known about him, by Israel Gollancz, with critical estimates of Shakespeare's genius by Walter Bagehot, Leslie Stephen, and Thomas Spencer Baynes. Shakespeare's Works—everything he wrote—are given complete, including the Sonnets and Poems. A set forms a complete Shakespearean Library.

We Send Free With This Edition a Complete Topical Index to Shakespeare's Works, by Means of Which Any Passage Can Be Found in a Few Seconds.

SEND THE COUPON NOW!

As long as the remaining thirty-seven sets last, reserved for The Saturday Evening Post readers, they will be closed out for $19.00 for a set in half-leather binding and $16.00 for sets in cloth binding. The amount saved by securing one of the remaining sets is shown by the fact that the regular trade prices of this publication are $44.00 and $36.00, depending upon the style of binding ordered. You run no risk in ordering, for, if you are not perfectly satisfied, we will take back the set without causing you any trouble or annoyance. The payments are $1.00 a month until the full amount is paid. Do not send any money with your order, but wait until you see the set before you pay a cent.

eye of his around the chamber and endangering the chandelier's integrity with the thunders of his voice.

"Then I came down to imitations of people I had seen and heard, and told stories, and those boys applauded everything that was worth applauding and I don't know but some things that weren't worth it.

"Well, when I went off and Captain Randolph came around to congratulate me I felt that little Bob Green, ex-hotel clerk and man-in-want-of-a-job, had found it, all right.

"Why, I felt as if I were seven feet high, and as if the United States were Heaven and the cadets were angels, and that it was perpetual summer outside, and that dates were growing on all the trees irrespective of the kind of tree, and that if Daniel Webster could have looked in on my triumph he would have said, 'Never in my life, young man, did I ever enthrall an audience as you have enthralled this one.' Consider what I had been before supper and you won't blame me for getting the big head.

"The boys went trooping out with their military stride, imitating my imitations, and followed by the officers and their wives and last of all the soldiers of the post, and then the business man of the combine came into the little room and said, 'Well, I suppose that now you'd like me to do a little business with you. It was a good show.'

"And then, for the first time, it struck me that I was in a fair way to become dishonest. Whoever that money belonged to it didn't belong to me and I said impulsively, 'I want to see Colonel Miller.'

"Colonel Miller is the high muckamuck of West Point, and I suppose it was a little like saying to a man in front of the White House, 'Say, will you run in and tell the President that I want to see him out here for about five minutes?' But I got the Colonel and he was a very unassuming, agreeable gentleman, too. I didn't give him a military salute, but I gave him an ex-hotel clerk's bow and then I said, 'Colonel Miller, were you satisfied with the entertainment this evening?'

"He expressed himself as having been very much delighted and said that it would do the boys good, and when he was through I said:

"'Thank you, I feel repaid; but I want to say that I can't accept the money that this gentleman wants to give me because—well, you see, I've played a trick on you all.'

"The Colonel stared at me in surprise.

"As hastily and as briefly as I could I told him all about myself and the events of the evening and the temptation to which I had yielded, and I wound up by saying, 'If you think I have earned a fee, all right, but, of course, the money this gentleman has was intended for Mr. Ingraham, and does not belong to me.'

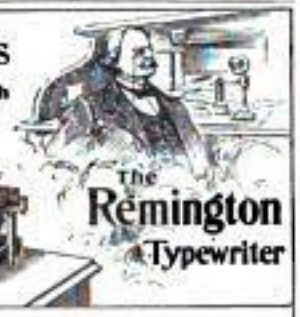
"The Colonel thought a minute, plumping his right fist into his left palm and then reversing the process, and at last he said:

"'Your course was a little unconventional, but you certainly succeeded in amusing the boys, and that's what they came here for to-night, and although you don't seem to be a regular but only a volunteer, still there's no doubt but you're the hero of this occasion, and to the victor belong the spoils.' Then he offered me his hand, waved me toward the treasurer and left the room.

"But just then I had a new thought, almost as brilliant as the first one. I said 'Wait a minute' to the treasurer and I followed the Colonel out into the auditorium. 'Colonel Miller,' said I, 'would it be out of the ordinary run for me to ask for a testimonial that I can use in a circular? I feel that this is a turning point in my career. If I can entertain West Point cadets I suppose I'll do for 'most anybody.'

"The Colonel elevated his brows prodigiously, coughed deeply and pursed up his lips, and then he said, 'Young man, I wonder why you never succeeded before.'

"That was all. Then he left me with the treasurer."



The train slackened up as it ran into Albany. The little group began to say appreciative things to Mr. Green, but the most eminently practical one of the lot, the one who was engineering the excursion, said:

"I'd like to know, if it's a fair question, how much the treasurer had in his pocket for Mr. Ingraham?"

"Two hundred dollars in crisp tens."

"And the owner of the thirty cents got it?"

"He did."

PERFECT SPEED CONTROL

enables you to thread a way quickly and safely through a crowded city street, or run at exhilarating speed on the boulevard or country road, when you travel in the

Winton

One of the cardinal virtues of the Winton is that it is always "well in hand." By the simplicity of its operating mechanism it enables the driver to be at perfect ease under all conditions, without burdening his attention with this or that gauge or lever. The speed is controlled by the spring "governor-button" under the driver's right foot. (See illustration below.) By simply increasing the pressure on this button, speed of car increases; relieve the pressure, the car slows down. No exertion—no effort—no distracting of attention. When, in addition to the mechanical reliability of the Winton, you consider its luxurious appointments and beauty of construction, you will appreciate its wonderful popularity.

Price of the 20 horse-power Winton Touring Car, complete with full brass side-lamps, horn, tools, etc., is $2500. Visit any of our branch or agency depots and the excellence of the Winton will be fully demonstrated.

Messrs. R. A. Whytlaw,
Son & Co., New York City

Gentlemen: Will you kindly examine the piece of red and white checker board Pique herewith? This is of your manufacture. One end (one-half of the piece) has been submerged for forty-eight hours in a solution of Pearline twelve times the ordinary wash tub strength. This is a more severe test of the effect of Pearline upon fabric and colors than would be

SEVENTEEN HUNDRED ORDINARY WASHINGS.

Can you tell us which half of this piece has been submerged? Does the color or the fabric show the slightest deterioration?

Yours truly,
James Pyle & Sons

She Who Fears Pearline

for colored wash fabrics, fine ginghams, delicate laces, etc., should herself make a test similar to that herein described. In this test we took a risk 1700 times as great as an ordinary Pearline wash where the contact period is 20 minutes and the quantity of Pearline used only 1-12 of that used in our test.

THE TEST The piece marked "after" was cut from the same goods as that marked "before," and was then soaked for 40 hours in a solution of Pearline 12 times as strong as the suds prescribed in Pearline directions.

THE RESULT Both pieces were photographed side by side. An expert cannot detect any loss or deterioration of color or fabric—there isn't any. Read accompanying letter from R. A. Whytlaw, Son & Company.

Prove Your Wash Fabrics

THE TEST Obtain a sample of material before buying: Cut it in half: Soak for any length of time one portion in a solution of Pearline as strong as directed for heaviest, coarsest washing. Rinse in clear water. Compare the portion washed with the unwashed half.

There will be no loss of color if the material is trustworthy.

If color fades when washed with Pearline

the material is not wash fabric

Messrs. Jas. Pyle & Sons
New York City

Dear Sirs: We have your favor of the 17th, along with the cutting of red and white checker board Pique. In reply, we beg to say that the white in the end WHICH WE BELIEVE to have been submerged appears to us to have been improved, i. e., a cleaner white, and the red comes up a slightly deeper tinge than in the original—improved, if anything. So far as the fabric is concerned, we had been soaked in Pearline.

COULD NOT DECIDE WHICH END

Yours faithfully,

Americans of To-Day and To-Morrow—By Albert J. Beveridge

THE END TO WHICH OUR POWER AND DOMINION MUST BE SHAPED IF IT IS NOT TO BE OUR UNDOING

WHAT is the secret of your power?" said one of those who sat by the bedside of the dying Richelieu. "Tell us, that we may continue your work for the good of France." And the dying statesman-soldier-priest answered: "Some say it is courage—that I am a lion; some say it is craft—that I am a fox. It is neither. It is justice." So runs the noble anecdote. Doubtless it is not true as a literal fact, but it ought to be true; therefore, for the purposes of human instruction it is true. Every man of sensibility occasionally finds a story which so interprets man and the world to him that henceforth it becomes a part of his character.

Such a tale is the legend of Richelieu. Apply it to the Republic. Justice! This Nation must be just. The first paper was designed to show our power, growing out of our location on the map of the world and the resources within us; the second paper attempted to show that out of the elements of our very being springs our first national and individual necessity of character: to wit, the necessity of conservatism, moderation, thoughtful poise. This paper is to demonstrate that this power which, unrivaled in the world if well conserved, must pass all other human influences and is worth while only when used justly.

And if the Nation must be just in its dealings with the world, its citizens must be just. Why? Because no citizen of the Republic can disassociate himself from the Nation. The Nation's necessities are his necessities; the Nation's characteristics, his characteristics; the Nation's opportunities, his opportunities; weightier than all, the Nation's duties are his duties. And duty is a great word. It is a greater word than the word wealth; greater than the words money, power, glory, dominance. It is the word which makes all the other words worth while. No sane man, no lover of his kind, no gentle man, can tolerate mere strength which is not directed to high purposes. Every one of us dislikes cant and all hypocrisy. Pretense of high purposes, which we know very well is not in the heart of the man who professes them, is repellent. But every one of us uncovers before the man whom in our very being we know to be both powerful and just. This is true even when such a man is a bitter personal enemy. "I hate him, but I must follow him. I cannot help it," exclaimed a local politician of a political leader whose boldness and forgetfulness of self in a great emergency had chained the attention of a State. "I must follow him—him, because he has been just." And so the ward politician of an American town repeated in substance the dying words of France's most accomplished statesman.

What Shall We Do With Our Power?

OUR critics assert that we are defective in art and the graces of life, but admit our power. In sheer might we are a Berserker people. Very well! What are we going to do with that power? We are going to conserve it, save it, regulate it, of course. But what for? To get fat upon? No! Merely to vaunt ourselves? No! To flaunt our flag before the world? No! To have it said of us that we are "unrivaled" or any other word of vainglory? No! What is all this power and wealth and domination for, then? Let any American search his soul and he will answer: "For righteousness—for justice—for the good of the world."

So we see that justice to other peoples (and therefore justice among ourselves) is the second element of national (and therefore individual) character which this Nation must possess. In these papers it would have been put first but that our strength will come to naught for good as well as for evil unless it is conserved.

We are "up against" all other nations—"up against" the world. (Let us not disdain our vernacular—the phrase of the "man of the street"—and therefore let us say "up against.") It is neither our merit nor our fault that this is so. Progress has made it so. Ocean greybounds have made it so. The cable has made it so. The wireless message will make it so even more than it is now. If Lettré said a century ago that "the globe is a very inferior planet," what would he say to-day? Whether we will or no, we are mixed up in the world's controversies. So, to-day, is every nation. We cannot keep to ourselves if we would. It is useless to argue whether this is bad or good. It is so.

Consider an analogy. There was a certain tragedy recently. The press carried its details in full. One cannot help but think that such advertisement of wickedness is a bad thing. But what is the use of moralizing? The press spread the news because the Nation was interested; the Nation was interested because to-day the Nation is a family; and the press is the national family gossip. The telegraph, the telephone, the electric railway, rural free delivery, everything has made the American People a single community. A town in Iowa is now a suburb of New York. Crawfordsville, Indiana, knows all about Boston. What happens in New Orleans happens in Chicago so far as the knowledge of the event is concerned. In the same way the American Republic is a member of the family of nations—a controlling member and destined to be more so. Preach against it as you will, the fact remains.

Having this condition, therefore, what is to be done? Justice is to be done. Righteousness is to be done. High purposes are to be accomplished. It is not cant to insist that we are agents of divine purposes.

> The hand that rounded Peter's dome
> And groined the aisles of Christian Rome
> Wrought in a sad sincerity;
> Himself from God he could not free.

So wrote Emerson. And he wrote truly of the artist. Did he not also write truly of this Nation? What American has not entertained from his youth the dream that this Nation shall be the arbiter of the destinies of the world? But the arbiter for what ends? Let us survive in history, at least, and in ideals wrought into deeds; for we shall surely have a physical ending (perhaps hundreds of years away, but none the less we cannot hope to escape the universal law of dissolution). A nobler race than ours will take our place. But let us be the noblest thus far evolved. Let us live up to our possibilities. And our possibilities! No contemporary mind can grasp them. The mind of the future will grasp them but not the mind of the present. The mind which the world will produce a thousand years from now will consider our work and problems very easy to do and very easy to solve, just as we now consider the conditions of mediæval times almost absurd in their simplicity. Very well. Let us show history that we lived up to the best that was within us. Let us show the future that we Americans were the best possible product of our times. We shall do all this if History writes of us: "The American People in their time were known of all men as 'the just nation.'"

We all read the Bible. Why do we read it? Because those ancient Hebrews (say what you will against them) gave the world moral ideas. They gave us those moral ideas along with crudeness and cruelty of conduct, it is true; but we forget the barbarity and we make the moral ideas our ideals and try to live up to them. The point is that truth, the loftiest views, genuine brotherhood are the only things worth while. And who would confine brotherhood to locality? It is "a contradiction in terms," as the logicians say, is it not? And if so, let us expand our thought and then ask: Who would confine brotherhood to boundaries—to nations?

By a chain of the logic of events, so strong that the wisest cannot account for it except upon the hypothesis of a divine wisdom which confounds statesmen, we have many foreign problems on our hands—the Philippine problem, the Cuban problem, the South American problem; in short, we have world problems. How are we going to solve them? For the good of ourselves? Certainly. The instinct of self-interest which is ineradicable settles that. But what is our self-interest? Dollars and cents? Yes, that is an element; because dollars and cents represent comforts, intelligence, ideals in the homes of the millions; and it is in the homes of the American millions that all these questions are going to be settled. But are they going to be settled exclusively for the comfort of those homes? Certainly not; for we are more than mere animals. They are going to be settled for the comfort of those American homes and also for the comfort of all other homes which our American influence reaches—and for the comfort of all these homes as a condition of their realizing the highest things of life. Therefore all our policies must be determined by those principles to which Richelieu's secret is the key—justice.

But what is justice? We have so many different opinions that it is hard to decide? Take the Philippine problem for illustration. Strenuous dissenters from the Nation's policy affirm that we should leave them to themselves—that it is unjust to force upon them other ideas than they have. Others—and a majority—assert that the firm hand and, gradually, as they can comprehend instruction, the ideals of civilization are the true method with them, as with a child. In this the writer shares. But of this one thing we may be sure: that whatever is just, whatever is best, the American millions will decide upon regardless of cost. In other words, power is worse than useless unless directed to the best ends which the possessor of that power is capable of conceiving. And the moral desire to do the right thing will give us the light to see what that right thing is.

Good manifestations of American spirit are found in those powerful Americans who "do things" in business. One such—a real "captain of industry"—said in young manhood: "I am going to do something in this world; I do not care whether it brings me millions or not. I know I shall organize vast industrial and commercial forces. I have it in me, and when I realize my plans I am going to do justice between capital and labor. Capital and labor, what misleading terms! Why not oneness? Why are not our interests all the same?" These words of the dreaming youth twenty-seven years ago are now the accomplished deeds of the mature man. For that young man is now the directing mind of large industrial organizations. And beneath what others call self is an almost religious desire to do his duty, not to the American People only, but to humankind. He has introduced "publicity"—a statement to the American Nation, to the world—of the assets and prospects of his corporations. He has developed and put into practice profit-sharing among scores of thousands of laborers. He has given the toiler a "stake" in the enterprises the toiler's labor helps create. And in all of it as high an ideal of justice as that which inspired King Arthur at his Round Table has governed him. More and more it is governing most of America's eighty millions. It is true that there are among us those who are sordidly self-seeking. They will not prevail in private business or in public life. They are not worth considering.

Be sure, young American of the twentieth century, that you may succeed temporarily with selfish plans and unjust practices, but all your large and far-reaching and permanent designs will fail unless they are based on justice to your fellowman and to the world.

The Obligations of Strength

A WEAK person may be tolerated for taking little advantages, but never a strong one. Putting it on the lowest plane, a strong man or a strong nation can afford to be just. It is good business. It begets a respect and confidence which are the best possible asset. And so it is that out of the very fact of our overwhelming powers grows the corresponding necessity of justice in our dealings with the world. Like conservatism, it is an element of our national character which our situation compels. The American statesman of to-day will fail even in the regard of his own countrymen if, in foreign controversies, he does not do justice even though that should work apparent sacrifices of American interests. All admit the power of public opinion in our internal affairs. Similarly, there is such a thing as international opinion, world opinion. He is a daring and foolish man who refuses to heed the settled convictions of his fellow-citizens in town, county and state; and just so the nation is unwise which despises the esteem which the rest of mankind puts upon it. When it is seen that, through the years and decades and centuries, a nation is just, a moral regard is earned more powerful than fleets and armies.

As before insisted upon, the principles of national conduct must be the principles of individual conduct of the citizen. Let us repeat, a thousand times if necessary, that no true American can separate himself from the Nation and its destiny. Let us weld and fuse our destinies into the Nation's destiny. Thus, the Nation's ideals become our personal ideals; and if the American Nation must be just, so must the American citizen. If "charity begins at home" no less does justice begin at home. Let every young American know that sharp practice is a certain method of business and social suicide. When a man after years of right living and upright dealing has it said of him, "He will do what is right," he has achieved a power among his fellows which millions could not give.

We have a class of practical people who want to get at the physical machinery for doing a thing which ought to be done. It is a good thing that we have such a class. But sometimes their practicability makes them unpractical—in great affairs, at least. If you cannot point out just how a desired end is to be reached they will say, "What is the use?" And so of this general necessity for justice as the ruling element in American policies and character, they will exclaim: "We agree, but by what device will you determine justice and enforce it?" But the large things of human life and history are not to be determined by any devices, but by a thing more effective than any mechanism of legislation. That thing is the spirit of the people. That is what we are pleading for now. If a people have woven into the fibre of their moral and mental being the element of justice, they will work out right conclusions as each occasion arises.

This Government is based upon public opinion; and public opinion is the composite conviction formed in the familiar conversations of the American fireside. In our early days we had in each colonial home the wheel and spindle and distaff; and the clothing of the family was wrought and made beneath the roof-tree by the American mother and daughter. They have disappeared; but the loom of intelligent talk from which emerges the fabric of a family's convictions has taken their place. And this fireside loom of family conversation is the mechanism which is going to work out all of our national problems for us. It is the machinery which is going to weave justice for ourselves and national justice toward other people.

In the Opinion of the Million is Justice

NOBODY who knows anything of American life ever appeals to the individual. He appeals to the family. No man's individual opinion is sure to be right upon anything; but it will not be far from wrong if his opinion is the conclusion of all around his hearthstone. It is amazing with what economic sense the mother, wife or sister will modify the views of husband, brother and son; and even the boys and girls, when large questions of right are put to them, are swift with elemental ideas of large and rough justice. And so the opinions which issue from the millions of American homes, combined, are in the long run going to be right opinions.

This is not only sentimentally so; it is practically true, and also scientifically correct. "Nature cares nothing for the individual," said an American scientist of universal and permanent reputation. "Nature eliminates the individual; Nature cares only for the pair—for the family." And so in the science of public affairs, individual opinion may be neglected; but the opinion of the family cannot be.

Let each American family, then, be the Nation in miniature and decide all questions, foreign and domestic, as though it were the court of the last resort. There is one thing that everybody who has studied Russia must admire about that singular people, however much he may dislike other things about them—the whole nation is built upon the idea of the family. It is a natural method of national solidarity. It is our American method, too. We are a Nation of families; and, as pointed out, these families are so connected that the whole Nation is a family. So that if the American family adopts justice as its ideal in daily conduct, the Nation is naturally going to adopt justice as its ideal in international conduct. And the American family will—does—make justice its ideal. For selfishness, individual advantage, personal gain of one member of the family as against the common good of all, is a thing abhorrent to the very idea of family itself. Given the principle of selfishness in sufficient force and the idea of family explodes. Given the idea of justice and forbearance, and the family is vital and enduring.

We are at present used to the word "commercialism." I like it very well if it means prosperity and happiness for the American home. But nobody likes it if it stands for mere animal opulence. But should any reader of this paper have reduced his habits of thought to dollars and cents, let us spend a paragraph in showing that justice pays higher dividends than anything else. Take mercantile life. In early practice, when he was studying possible clients, a young lawyer heard a leading business man referred to as the "sharpest buyer in his line." Investigation showed that he was a man who took advantage wherever he could. For a while it really appeared that success was the slave of his cunning brain. But it was only for a while. Not two decades have passed and that man is not only a business failure but has rendered further business success an impossibility. He lost credit and countenance among those with whom he dealt. "Advantage" and not "justice" was his motto, and that motto led him to the brink over which he plunged.

The Rewards of Sharp Practice

A YOUNG lawyer, brilliantly endowed and who started out with fine performance which argued a still finer promise, was seen by the judges on the bench and by his professional brethren to indulge in "sharp practice." He became fond of finesse in professional work. The ethics of the law were to him "foolery." He said one day in the intoxication of success over one of his masterpieces of craft: "Well, I admit it; I like sharp practice, and it wins, too. Besides, it is such fun to disarm a fool." What was the result? With all his finished swordsmanship he soon found himself dueling with all society; and that master antagonist disarmed him. With his superb abilities he has been quietly eliminated from his profession and from all human usefulness.

Take politics. It is noteworthy that the great "bosses" are scrupulous of their word and prize the reputation of "never going back on a friend" dearer than real statesmen prize the authorship of great laws, the championship of high ideals. This is an acknowledgment that even from their viewpoint these bosses make personal justice the mainspring of their machines. They would fail otherwise. And how many times has the country noted the collapse of individual careers because of inherent selfishness and injustice. Sometimes a man by wealth or other means reaches a position of power. If his ambition gets the better of his common-sense, his fears of possible rivals distort his whole moral perspective. He becomes unjust to other public men. He schemes for the downfall of those he thinks dangerous to his selfish hopes. If he controls a newspaper he is sure to see that his organ over-capitalizes his public work to the people and also that it discredits and conceals the work of other public men. What is the result? In the American home (that temple of American conscience) a great question mark vaguely forms in the family mind and constantly grows more definite until it is a burning sign. And before that blazing interrogation point the schemes and ambitions of this public worker of injustice dissolve and come to naught. Why do they come to naught? Merely because the ambitious one has forgotten justice; and he who forgets justice, justice will forsake. And justice is the ruling deity of the American household and the American Nation.

This paper and many more might be taken up with incidents like the above—true ones and typical; and each reader can supply scores within his own observation. Each reader, too, can supply scores of the reverse—hundreds, where the doing of just work day by day has made those of moderate and even poor talents permanently successful.

Into our daily conduct, then, let us each weave this all-powerful element. Its growth, upon cultivation, will surprise the most skeptical. Mr. Porter, in his work on Moral and Mental Philosophy, which years ago was a textbook in all colleges, speaking of the force of habit, said something to the effect that "Neglect conscience in your daily deeds and it will soon be atrophied. Cultivate it and it will soon become as delicate as a woman's blush." And Hamlet tells his mother that "habit is a second nature." Modern scientific thought will not go that far; yet all will admit as a matter of daily experience that the influence of habit has a power something akin to the power of Nature itself. The power of habit in moral ideas is just as great as in immoral practices. So, if the habit of our daily lives is justice, it will grow after a while into a fixture of our character. Conversely, if all resolve that the deeds of the Nation in our transactions with foreign people shall have, above all, the ingredient of justice in them we shall soon come to apply to ourselves the same thought which makes us require the Nation to be just.

Justice, then, Americans of the twentieth century! Pride in the Republic is false if not based on justice. Hopes for the Republic's destiny are mere mirages unless justice makes them real. Neglect not ideals. They are more permanent than cities or farms or railroads in a nation's career. And of all ideals, justice is the first; over all ideals justice presides.

A Feverish Berth

EUGENE H. PLUMACHER, of Tennessee, has been consular agent at Maracaibo since 1878 and consul since 1883. Many patriots, who desired to serve their country for the $2000 salary Consul Plumacher enjoys, have gone to Maracaibo, but none has remained. Plumacher attends to that.

At the State Department in Washington they say when a ship arrives bringing a consul appointed to Maracaibo Plumacher is on the dock with effusive greetings.

"My dear sir," says Plumacher, "I extend to you the heartiest of welcomes. I——." Then, as if struck by a sudden thought, Plumacher withdraws the hands he has outstretched and says: "But, no, I must not touch you, for I have just returned from officiating at the last sad rites for two dear friends who died of the yellow fever."

The consul shudders. Later in the day, after he has dined with Plumacher, they take a stroll. The newcomer sees a row of graves, each decorated with an American flag.

"Do they decorate the graves of soldiers here, too?"

"Oh, no," replies Plumacher. "Those are not soldiers. There rest the remains of several fellow-countrymen, each of whom came here to be consul. They all died of the yellow fever and I strive to honor their memories."

That is enough. The next ship takes the quaking patriot home, and Plumacher settles down to the routine of official life until another ambitious successor arrives.

TALKS WITH A KID BROTHER AT COLLEGE—By Jesse Lynch Williams

HORSE PLAY

I HEAR they have been electing you president, or is it manager, of one of the teams—what's that? Only assistant manager, is it? Same thing; as you are to be graduated into full importance of managership next year.

How did I find out about it? Not from you; you said nothing about this momentous matter in your last letter. But it wasn't necessary. I am a fairly intelligent American citizen; I keep in touch with the more important processes of civilization. This piece of history was spread broadcast to the metropolitan newspapers—took its place along with news of Congress' action about that little Philippine matter, and the trouble with the Northern Pacific, and the attempt at assassination of some foreign potentate or other, who wasn't important enough for me to remember.

Think how proud I must be! I am his brother. I knew him years ago. Didn't I point this item out to every one within hail of my chair at the club? And when I finally put the paper down I left it on the table folded over at that place so the next man who picked up that copy would be sure to see the news about the family—only just then along came Peter, a most unimaginative servant, who smoothed it out straight again, just as if it were an ordinary newspaper. Say, Dick, you ought to subscribe to a clipping bureau now; think of the number of times your name will be in the papers during the next two years: "At the close of the meeting, Manager Dickie was asked to make a statement, but declined to discuss the matter." Ah! "declined to discuss the matter!" Think of waving the reporters aside magnificently, jumping into a cab and dashing away with an important scowl upon your brow! Been bothered with many requests from boarding-school girls for your autograph?

"Horse you?" I wouldn't do that for the world. Quit grinning and looking foolish. No. You needn't wear that resigned look of silent suffering, either. I'm not going to preach to you against the danger of a swelled head. You fellows are keen enough about spotting symptoms of swelled head in one another. Sometimes you overdo the thing. Now, there was Chesty Chisholm.

A charming fellow; not prominent, like you—that's right, blush and dodge behind yourself—but a nice, normal chap, of more than average intelligence and breeding, who had an efficient sense of humor and therefore a fairly adequate appreciation of the mutual attitude and inter-relations of himself and the universe. But he had an odd gait, carried his shoulders with a conceited swing, looked chesty. So they called him "Chesty."

This is a good illustration, by the way, of how some fellows get an undeserved reputation. He inherited this peculiarity from his father, class of sixty-something—was back here for a reunion one commencement; we noticed he walked in exactly the same way. But Chesty did not know he had an odd walk, and, for that matter, he did not worry much over being called Chesty—until he was more than half-way through his college course.

One night in the spring of his junior year a gang of his pals happened to be passing by—I believe this is the way the thing began—when one of them saw Chesty standing at his window, and so naturally bawled out, "Hello-o, Chesty Chisholm!" Chesty looked down at them and nodded. "Hello, you fellows," he remarked casually.

"Hello-o, Chesty Chisholm," yelled another of the gang.

"Hello, Chesty Chisholm," bellowed a third—you know how I mean. Then, being in a jocular mood, they all began shouting it together in a way that would seem very foolish to older people who are not in sympathy with youth, or certain youths who are as self-possessed as they are self-conscious.

Chesty stood at the window grinning at these wild Indians for a moment, and then telling them where to go or some other proper or improper retort, slammed the window and thought that was the end of a little episode like hundreds of campus episodes which happen nightly, and which would not be worth mentioning except that the next night the same gang happened to be coming home from the grill-room, and the same thing happened again.

This time some other fellows across the quadrangle, hearing the racket, poked their heads out of their open windows and also yelled, "Hello, Chesty Chisholm." Then some others way down on the back campus, being tired of poling, and desirous of a diversion, echoed the refrain from the distance. Chesty grinned, kept on undressing and went to sleep.

That was the last good sleep he had for two weeks. As soon as he appeared the next day the gang reminiscently saluted him from a distance in the same manner. For no reason in the world except that they felt like it they continued to do so. By nightfall all of his classmates were shouting, "Hello-o, Chesty Chisholm," whether they spied him a quarter of a mile away or did not see him at all. After that everybody, whether friends of his or not, took it up like a war cry. Even under-classmen joined in who did not know him, except by sight as a man who looked stuck on himself. On the way to lectures, coming back from the club or at the close of baseball practice, some one would think to shout, "Hello, Chesty Chisholm"; then some one else, then every one would echo it. After senior singing the front campus sounded like a riot. No one had anything against him, you know, but it seemed worth while to join in the chorus.

He stood it pretty well for a while; smiled and went on about his business, swinging his shoulders; but eventually it got on his nerves. He wondered why they did it; hadn't thought much about himself before; and decided that there must be something queer about him. He tried to keep out of the way as much as possible; stuck to his room—even there he could hear them yell when any one in the crowd thought to start it going. Came late to his meals. If they hellooed at him he grinned outside, but within he cringed.

One day he did not appear at the club at all. After dinner some of the gang went up to see if he were ill. They found him standing over a half-packed trunk.

"Where're you going, Chesty?" they asked.

"Thought I'd take a little trip," he said.

"Why, see here, your books are all boxed up!"

"Yes, boxed up."

"Do you mean to leave college entirely?"

"Yes, I'm leaving."

"What in thunder are you doing that for?"

Finally they got it out of him.

"Oh, there's nothing tragic about it," he added, flushing. "You needn't look at me that way. I suppose I could stick it out if I wanted to, but I don't care to. It doesn't pay, that's all. I've had about enough. Everybody yells at me all day and most of the night. Even freshmen I never saw before point me out—yes, they do; I can see them grin and punch each other and they say, 'There's the man they call Chesty Chisholm.' I don't blame them, I don't blame you fellows or anybody. If you want to call me Chesty go ahead, I can't help it. I suppose I must be sort of objectionable. So I'm leaving. Good-by. I've got to finish packing."

Well, of course, he wasn't allowed to do any more packing that evening. But, do you know, he was so determined that it took them half the night to dissuade him. They had to drag him by main force out of the room. Then, while the rest unpacked his things, two of his best friends took him off and filled him up with a good supper and afterward walked him away out into the country and talked him out of it. For the first time in his life he found out how well he was liked. Next day, of course, they spread the tip among the class to let up on Chesty. The novelty of the gag had worn off by this time, anyway, so it was comparatively easy to silence the rest of the college by hisses and loud orders to "cut it out" whenever anybody began it. So it gradually ceased entirely and every one forgot all about it. But no one, except his intimate friends, knows how near they came to queering the college course of a man they liked and respected—all because they did not know when to stop their "horsing."

That, of course, is an extreme case, but all the same from my observation the modern young man is not so often hampered by conceit as by the lack of it. Of course, we all know exceptions—and exceptions are always more obtrusive, or else they wouldn't be exceptions. But, at any rate, there has been quite enough said already about the assurance of youth; and so, though it always goes, I don't intend to join in. Youth and conceit are supposed to dash blindly forward, hand in hand: that is proverbial, but if proverbs are sound they must teach something—that is the object of proverbs, isn't it? Well, by this time I believe youth has learned a little from this one. If not, then it isn't worth teaching: Q. E. D. either way. Most of you overwork the modest act. "Oh, my, no! really I am of no account—I can't do anything—please let me crawl into my hole and hide," seems to be your attitude.

Sometimes it takes several years out of college to get over it; more than once I've seen a young man sort of wake up suddenly, when he has found himself, rub his eyes and seem to say, "Well, for Heaven's sake! why didn't I realize this before!"

Just between you and me there is a great deal more simon pure overweening conceit among men of my age, or, say, when they're a little older and have begun to take on fat. And to my mind this calm, impenetrable self-satisfaction, this fatty degeneration of the ego, is much more absurd than the yawping, barking confidence of the puplike age, which at worst is merely amusing.

The fact is, I sometimes wonder how you fellows can keep on listening with so much respectful patience when these old boys come down here and blow off the same old hot-air bombast. But how did we stand it? I can see them now standing before us, smiling kindly, a frock coat buttoned tight across the stomach to make it look like a chest, and seeming to say, "Am I not (as my wife tells me) a fine figure of a man!" as they let fly at us about youth and its futile dreams of conquering the world: "I know how it is, I was once a young man myself (astonishing thought!) I, too, have trod yonder classic, elm-shaded paths," and so on as usual. We used to sit very still and try to look duly impressed as became our youth and inexperience. But sometimes I couldn't help thinking, suppose we did not know our place, suppose instead of holding our peace and filing out modestly while he beamed down upon us, with a patronizing smirk, pronouncing us a fine, manly, modest lot—just suppose we were to let loose and say, "Hi there! Fatty, don't judge us by yourself. Simply because you happened to be a conceited prig in college it does not necessarily follow that all of us are. You were a young man at the most artificial period of the century. You read Byron and took Bulwer Lytton seriously, and sat on horse-hair sofas, and curled incipient side-whiskers before ugly walnut bureaus. What do you know about us, anyway! But you do know something about the real world, presumably; why don't you give us some straight talk about that. What we, who are kids, want from you, who are men, is a little substantial encouragement once in a while, a little assurance that there's a fighting chance for a fellow across the great divide; not so much discounting of the future and a little more faith in it. Give us something solid to take hold of, to fasten on to, to live by—then we'll rise up and call you blessed."

But nowadays, Dick, I find myself on certain occasions assuming the same irritating note. You will come to it yourself, some day. In freshman year you thought you would always be above "horsing," but when you came to sophomore year you did it too—was it to get your revenge?

Editor's Note—This is the fourth of Mr. Williams' "Talks." The next will appear in an early number.

THE LIGHTER SIDE

Some Humors of the White House

BY ALFRED HENRY LEWIS

"IT SHOULD be about this place," said Bronson Howard, the playmaker, tapping on the sidewalk with his umbrella. He was on Pennsylvania Avenue at the time. "I was a toddling youngster of say three to four. My father, having first shaken me as though I were a bottle of medicine, gave me an emphatic cuff on the ear. I was turning these phenomena in my small mind and wondering thereover, for my father was in no sort prone to such manual vivacities, when he called my attention to a coffin being borne through the doors of the National Hotel.

"'My child,' said he with vast solemnity, 'I cuffed you to impress upon your childish memory how that coffin carries the body of the great Henry Clay, and that you and I are in Washington in attendance upon his funeral.'

"In such fashion," concluded the author of Aristocracy, "did it happen that the first thing I can recollect in this life was the death and burial of the Kentucky compromiser, albeit I, at the time, far from approved my parent's methods and wailed dolefully thereat. My tears, however, much dovetailed with the funeral occasion and gave me, I was told later, a most respectable appearance."

President Hayes during his White House residence had a better place in Washington estimation than he now owns in history. He was liked by the folk about him, and came to be almost as often and as easily in the streets as his predecessor. Mrs. Hayes was much upon his arm for these walks; and on Sundays she would have him across Lafayette Square to their church, where he was heroic enough to sit through dull sermons and act as though he liked them. Mrs. Hayes was a lady of elevation and no little fineness as well as force. In one respect this stood unfortunate for Hayes, since it is ever the husband's fate to be underestimated when discovered in contrast with a wife who overshadows him.

Hayes had his own dry wit, too, and could say a sharp thing when spurred. Here would be a specimen: A certain Senator—very arrogant was this statesman—had crowded and pressed hard upon Hayes to fill a vacant collectorship. Hayes, though often urged, seemed in no headlong mood to act. One afternoon the arrogant Senator was at the White House on business other than the collectorship. As he went about his departure it occurred to him to take a sneering shot at the President over the delayed appointment.

"I trust, Mr. President," observed the arrogant one, "that your industry will get around to that collectorship in time to give it to my executor?"

"Believe me," said Hayes, turning a grim eye on the other, "I should be most pleased to give it to your executor."

The Airing of the Presidential Linen

RECURRING to the subject of Presidents' wives, when Mrs. Harrison came first to the White House she accomplished one feat of housecleaning which sent a profound thrill throughout the red-tape contingent, and was a shock to folk with whom precedent or custom has the place of moral principle.

It would appear that since the days of the pipe-smashing Jackson it had been usage, so soon as a resolution or a bill was printed, to send two copies thereof to the White House for the enlightenment, if not the improvement, of the Presidential mind. None of these precious documents was read, since the President—whoever he might be at the time—held always that it would be soon enough to burden himself with such knowledge when the measure passed House and Senate and came beneath his nose for veto or approval. Still these copies were not destroyed; they were pigeonholed as they came in, and when enough had been assembled to make a sizable bundle, given a belt of red tape and filed away in the empty garret of the mansion, there to sleep and put on coats of dust as part of the dormant machinery of State. There abode no public reason why these papers should be preserved; but then their collection and subsequent hiving in the garret gave employment to a brace of clerks and formed the basis of a pair of salaries, and that, you should know, is—practically speaking—a great first purpose of all government. And since bills and resolutions, in their multiplication, are a thriving industry, during those sixty years to fall between the Harrison régime and that of the far-away Jackson, the garret had grown quite choked with the accumulated many tons of these documents.

Editor's Note—This is the second of four papers by Mr. Lewis. The next will appear in an early number.

THE EX-SPEAKER SAT COCKED UP IN AN EASY CHAIR

Now to Mrs. Harrison's glory, be it written, her instincts were emphatically those of the housewife. She had not been in the Executive Mansion an hour before she began an exhaustive exploration of her new domain. The vasty attic caught her eye; it would be a pearl of an attic wherein to dry the family washing when Monday chanced to be a rainy day. But these stacks and cocks of musty, dusty papers were in the way. What a world of them there was, too, to clutter the place!

To one of experience, however, solution should be easy and instant. The ragman was summoned and the obstructing bills and resolutions were disposed of at two cents a pound, and therefrom a tidy sum was harvested. Also, with the disappearance of this lumber Mrs. Harrison rejoiced in a garret as empty as a political promise and almost as big as a ten-acre lot. The largest washing on the most rainy Monday of all time might have found a refuge there.

But these improvements made a cry, I warrant you! When the next bundle of collected bills was ready for a final filing away the clerk discovered the loss. His heart was almost made to cease its beat; he wrung his hands and lifted up the wail of one made desolate. What might he do? That devastation was the fact accomplished; the archives of the nation had gone the way of rags, and in their sacred stead there hung the Presidential washing undismayed.

Harrison's Pet Anecdote

HARRISON was a soul of silence and reserve; one meeting him felt a distinct chill, as though a wind blew off an ice field. For these Arctic attributes of silence and frigidity there came few to be warm friends of Harrison. Notably was he distasted by high spirits of his own party, and such frank discussionists as Teller of the Senate went to utter lengths in criticism against him, even to the point—on very slight occasion, too—of declaring that he ought to be impeached. This is quoted rather in illustration of how bitless and bridleless an irritated Senator will go, than because there was a least foundation therefor in anything the President had done. Still, as he lost adherents among his own party folk in the Senate, he drew the enemy about him in friendly bonds, and his chief spokesman and champion on the Senate carpet was Morgan, of Alabama.

For all his ice and chilly quietudes Harrison owned a sense of humor, and would now and then get hold of a joke and treasure it as a schoolboy might an apple, having it frequently out of his pocket to exhibit and admire. One such would be a story he was ever quick to tell on the austere Justice Field, who didn't like it.

Complaining letters of all sorts come to a President. One day a Western marshal grew querulous because an item in his accounts, by which the Government was charged with a carriage furnished Field from his hotel to the court, had been disallowed. The marshal's grief was made the sharper since his fellow-marshal of an adjoining State had likewise furnished a carriage for Field when he held court within his district, and the charge had been allowed and paid.

Commonly, little attention is given to these cries of the wronged beyond what is required to shunt them upon a "proper" official—usually the one against whom complaint is lodged. But in this instance Harrison asked his secretary to discover the truth of the trouble. Why was one charge allowed and the other refused?

The secretary took a look into the riddle and learned that the fortunate one had been sagacious enough to include the carriage for Field in his item of expense "For care and transportation of prisoners." In that way it was allowed. It used to give Harrison much pleasure to relate this yarn; Field, however, saw nothing funny in it.

"BELIEVE ME," SAID HAYES, "I SHOULD BE MOST PLEASED TO GIVE IT TO YOUR EXECUTOR"

Cleveland's Liking for a Good Story

CLEVELAND, though of warmer currents than Harrison, was, when all was in, by no means so easy of access. Harrison felt inclined to see everybody in an iceberg way, while he thawed to none. On the other hand, Cleveland in no sort yielded to the theory that any who might find his way to the White House was entitled to clip a yard or two from his time. His friends might come at any hour and stay to any length; but strangers were made wholly and solely to deal with that very lamb's wool of private secretaries, the gentle Thurber. Of course they could get nothing from Thurber, not even information; still they failed not to bring away a vague glow about their soul's roots which Thurber's genuine, even though it were pointless, amiability had furnished. The milk-mild Thurber is dead now and adrift on other seas than these; yet it should be said of him that of those who came about Cleveland in his second term there was none more honest, more patient or more true.

Cleveland, like many another tenant of the White House, was sharp to enjoy a good story and could not hear too many. It is the mark common of genuine fisherman, as shown by Izaak Walton; still with that we have nothing to do. And Cleveland could be mightily tickled with an apt characterization of a favorite, as when Vest, of the Senate, while discussing Ambassador Bayard because of certain unguarded and somewhat flamboyant utterances of that diplomat, referred to Bayard as "that Ambassador of solar walks and lunar ways." This was a fair dab at Bayard, who possessed equal fame for an incoherency of method and a manner sun-kissed and glorious.

Speaking of stories, it may be safely printed down—since folk will do for laughter what they will not do for right—that more bad measures have been helped over the stile by good stories than by all sly bribes to fill the pocket, or lies and sophistries to fill the ear. The man who laughs, like the man who hesitates, is lost, and Cleveland could be moved and mollified by a story; so could House and Senate. Once Cleveland vetoed a private pension bill; in his message reciting his reasons he, among others, said that the would-be pensioner was a drunkard.

Jones, in the Senate from Nevada, was the author of the measure. He moved to pass it over the Presidential veto. Then, promptly pitching upon the charge of drunkenness as though it were the lone veto reason given, he told a story.

"It was long ago," said Jones. "I was loafing through an idle day in San Francisco. To kill the time I went into a courtroom and put in an hour listening to a trial then and there in progress. The plaintiff had broken his leg—he had alleged a defective sidewalk and sued the city. The attorney for the city interposed a plea of contributory negligence; he said he would show how the plaintiff, when he broke his leg, was drunk. But the Judge stopped him in mid-career; he was a good Judge and had a nose of vigorous red.

"'The Court will not entertain such a defense,' said the Judge, looking sternly at the lawyer for the city. 'Both the law and the equity are against you. Why should drunkenness on the part of this plaintiff be a bar to his recovery? Sir, a drunken man, under the law, is as much entitled to a perfect sidewalk as a sober man, and needs one more.'"

The Senate laughed, and on the tides of that laughter the pension bill came riding into port over the President's veto. When Cleveland heard the story he, too, laughed; also he informed Jones that had he in the beginning come to the White House and told him that tale, he doubtless would have foregone the veto and signed the bill.

The Blaine-Reed Feud

WHEN Blaine was Secretary of State with Harrison he went in for bolts, drawn curtains and secrets. The whole Department was quick to take on this locked-door atmosphere, and even to walk in the corridors of the State Department building was to feel one's self wading in knee-deep mysteries. The most open attitude of Blaine was his antipathy to Reed while the latter gentleman of brilliant wit and point reigned Speaker of the House. The feud in its inception had fallen forth over an ancient collectorship; and engendered of opposing interests in politics it was continued through jealousy. This left Reed—very much by his own choice, however—decisively alone as far as official folk from Maine were concerned, for Blaine's frown was equal to exile in his State. Blaine feared the spreading importance of Reed; he might scarce forgive him that Speakership which made him a power second only to the White House.

It was during that drastic rule of Reed when he "counted" a quorum and drew so much of malediction from Democrats

HIS HEART WAS ALMOST MADE TO CEASE ITS BEAT

—albeit the precedent therefor was made by no less a Jeffersonian than Thurman, who when President pro tem. of the Senate also "counted" a quorum—that an article of vitriol appeared in criticism of Reedian gavel methods and to denounce the Speaker as a House Nero. Reed supposed the article to have been written by Blaine himself. This was error; it was the bitter off-put of Gail Hamilton's pen—she was Blaine's sister by marriage—but since Blaine would on every chance read the attack to any who might come equipped with leisure to listen, Reed was not wanting justification for his belief.

It has been stated how the difference with Blaine, which was never repaired, left Reed to himself and marked him in Maine politics for a sort of Robinson Crusoe. He was a maroon—a kind of castaway of party. This isolation—confined, of course, to Maine—gains suggestion when one remembers that while both Frye and Hale were Senators of his State for years, and at the north end of the Capitol while he ruled as Speaker at the other, Reed never spoke with either or so much as enjoyed the formality of an introduction until after the passing of Blaine and when Reed was given the gavel for the second time. One gathers, too, a thought of the burly independence of the great Speaker from the fact that when his first meeting with the Maine Senators did take place, the Speaker's room at one corner of the House was the theatre chosen for that peace-making. Frye and Hale would have to do the walking.

"When a man attacked me," said Morrison, of Illinois, when retelling his tariff estrangements with Carter Harrison, "it was never my custom to seek him and show him he was wrong. I fought with him until he found his error out."

There was much in Reed that displayed him for a born brother to Morrison; he who could bend him could bend iron.

Blaine was a man of prides and sensibilities easily touched. If wounded, whether through carelessness or by design, he would requite the debt. This justice to be revenged would exert itself in smallest things, and once shone forth in a certain incident of social give-and-take between Blaine and the British Ambassador—then a Minister.

The latter, in converse with Blaine at the time, made an engagement to meet with him in the Diplomatic Room on the next Thursday at four o'clock.

"You will," said the Englishman, calling his secretary to his elbow, "remind me at the proper time how I have an engagement to meet with the Secretary of State on Thursday at four."

The following evening the Englishman encountered Blaine at a White House dinner.

"Let me see," he cried; "I've an appointment with you for Thursday at four?"

"I don't remember," replied Blaine with a sour twinkle; "you should ask your secretary."

Reed on the Cleveland-Hill Love Feast

THOUGH Reed was of a perverse and stiff-necked generation whenever it became a question of dealing with force, he abode a miracle of splendid frankness and open-door democracy at such times as the calls of their craft took the folk of newspapers to him on a quest for information. And yet Reed was of closest counsel; he told no news, and his frankness came to be rather a frankness of wit than of information. One might always rely on being flung some epigram, though he withheld the sought-for fact.

"MR. SPEAKER, HOW MUCH DO YOU WEIGH?"

It was about eight of the clock one evening when the sudden word descended upon newspaper row that Hill, Senator from New York, and until that hour reckoned among Cleveland's implacable enemies, was having his dinner with the President. This amazing story carried the wilder thrill, since it came at a time when Gorman and Vest and Harris and Morgan and Turpie and others of fiery kind were grilling both Cleveland and Hill in the Senate as cooks broil partridges. Among sages of eminence whose views were sought that night was Reed at the Shoreham. The ex-Speaker sat cocked up in an easy chair nursing a sprained ankle. He was asked what he deduced, as a scientist of politics, from this abrupt reconciliation of Cleveland and Hill over terrapin, canvas-back and burgundy.

"Why, then," returned Reed, bearing in evident mind those Senate fires whereon the two were just then stretched, "I deduce only the truth of the aphorism, 'Misery loves company.'" This in his usual drawling manner of speech, irresistibly comic.

Crisp, who was Reed's successor for the Speakership, and whom Reed in his turn would succeed, stood the sole figure among House Democrats who could match Reed in debate. Reed spoke all in one tone like the wind in a pine tree, and paused after each fourth word as though dictating to a leaden stenographer. There were no phrase-flourishes, no dictional graces; but the epigrammatic pelt of it and the hailstorm of sarcasm would beat the opposition as flat as a field of turnips. More often than once was Crisp driven to call a member to the chair and in person take the floor against Reed.

In figure and manner there were few likenesses between Reed and Crisp. The latter was exceedingly the Southern gentleman, affable, sincere, easy, wide in his friendships and his sympathies. He would as soon think of suicide as giving an insult or accepting one. Withal, he was fair in his judgments, and held the scales as Speaker evenly. In person Crisp was groomed and fine, and while physically large had an air of elegance and lightness. Reed was more the oak and solid—a giant, too, in height and chest girth. His forebears had been ocean-goers for over two centuries, and something of this aquatic ancestry would show even in his walk, which was like a ground-swell. As easy of approach as Crisp, he was not so urbane, and could be counted on for hot flashes of wit which not uncommonly were set to singe the one in converse with him. And yet, while the opposite might have been guessed from any casual study of the two, Reed was more led by rule—had, as it were, a deeper respect for law, as law, than Crisp.

FOR ALL HIS ICE AND CHILLY QUIETUDES, HARRISON OWNED A SENSE OF HUMOR

How the Great Speaker Feared the Law

THE House was in session. There came to the "Speaker's door," so called, an ex-Member and his wife. The ex-Member desired to have his wife into the rear lobby where the portraits of former Speakers hang. Particularly, he wanted to show the lady that portrait of Reed which, though no likeness, is reckoned for reasons known only to artists a transcendent work.

The ex-Member might, under the rules, invade the lobby, and for that matter the floor of the House itself; but he couldn't take the other member of his family. In this dilemma the ex-Member sent his card to Reed. That gentleman responded; Reed and the ex-Member were close friends and had been House cronies but the Congress before. The ex-Member presented Reed to his wife, and explained his anxiety to take her into the lobby and give her a view of Reed's famous picture. They were to leave town on the four o'clock; if she did not then see the picture it would have to take its place with privileges missed.

"Do you think," said the ex-Member, "it would be possible to hold the rules in abeyance for a moment while I take Mrs. M. into the lobby? A glance at the picture is all she wants."

Reed was troubled; it stood plain on his face that he would give a deal to comply with the ex-Member's request.

"I am sorry," he said at last, "but in all honesty, I shouldn't like to violate the rules."

Reed returned to the House, and the ex-Member and his wife were about to depart, the lady in mighty disappointment. At this pinch Crisp came out of his room. He paused to greet the ex-Member. Being made known to the lady and observing her look of discontent, Crisp asked the reason in his polite, half-smiling fashion.

"She wanted to see Reed's picture," said the ex-Member, "but the House is in session, and of course the rules forbid."

"The reason of the rule," responded Crisp, "is to guard the House from being disturbed. Now Mrs. M. could not possibly disturb the House with her light foot and little figure. And so you see the 'reason' of the rule disappears. You know the aphorism, 'When the reason ceases, then ceases the law.' I think Mrs. M. with the greatest propriety may come into the lobby." And the Georgia Chesterfield would have the lady enter and look on Reed's painted features.

"I'm afraid," laughed the ex-Member to Crisp, while the trio stood about the picture, "that Reed is more law-abiding than you. Now he would not take Mrs. M. inside."

"Then," responded Crisp with a laugh, "he should have collected his ingenuity as a Yankee and turned the flank of the situation. He should have called one of the House messengers and had the picture brought out to Mrs. M. You see, Madam," concluded Crisp, bowing as his visitors took their leave, "I believe a lady should ever have her free, uninterrupted way; it is with me a life principle."

What No Gentleman Should Weigh

REED'S vast physique gave him no little uneasiness, and the story the scales told was one of his secrets. Little, flighty General Wheeler—himself not to weigh one hundred pounds—being struck by the Speaker's proportions, put the question: "Mr. Speaker," piped the midget warrior, looking the House Colossus up and down with wide eyes—"Mr. Speaker, how much do you weigh?"

It was the last query Reed would answer. He bent a look—half cynicism, half reproof—on the tactless small Wheeler. In the end he shook his head reproachfully and said: "General, no gentleman ever weighs over two hundred pounds."

"BUT THE JUDGE STOPPED HIM IN MID-CAREER"
